ABSTRACT

Thirty-one States have a form of mandatory meet and confer or collective bargaining law; six States have permissive legislation; seven States are considering collective bargaining legislation. This guide presents, in chart form, the legal provisions for each State with respect to employee classification, type of representation, administration, scope of barquiring, impasse procedure, grievance procedures, unfair practic penalties, and deadlines. Proposed Pederal legislation is analyzed in the final chapter. (DW)

Lawrence Raful, ECS legal intern from the University of Denver, has provided the analysis of federal legislation: "The Effect of Federal Legislation on Public Employe Bargaining Rights," and the appendixes.

Thomas A. Emmet, special assistant to the president, Regis College, Denver, has graciously provided special consultative help in the charting of state legislation. In addition, Emmet was instrumental in the publication of ECS Report No. 45, Collective Bargaining in Postsecondary Educational Institutions, used as a resource for this brief.

A special reference in the preparation of the state legislation chart was the Government Employee Relations Report published by the Bureau of National Affairs, Inc., Washington, D.C.

Other basic information for this report was drawn from state education codes and from the research files and publication, of the ECS Research and Information Services Department—notably its annual series of publications, State Education Legislation and Activity by Doris M. Ross Introduction.

At the time of the Education Commission of the States (ECS) annual meeting in mid-1968, the collective bargaining issue revolved around the question of whether or not—that is, whether or not public employes, including those in education, should have the right to bargain. With illegal public employe strikes occurring with increasing frequency, along with demands for unionization of such employes, the issue had claimed legislative attention in some 16 states that had, by then, passed meet and confer or collective bargaining laws covering teachers and boards of education.

Since 1959, when Wisconsin pioneered the collective bargaining concept for public employes, more than half the states have followed suit with mandatory laws covering some or all of their education employes. The issue is no longer whether or not to permit public employe collective bargaining, but how to implement such bargaining and how to prevent and/or deal with public employe strikes which endanger the general well-being of the population.

Thus, in many 1975 state legislative sessions, collective bargaining for public employes has assimed a top priority status. Of those states which have no legislation in effect, ECS has identified Colorado, Illinois, Kentucky, North Carolina, Ohio, Virginia and West Virginia as states that will consider passage of a public employe collective bargaining or meet and confer law in 1975. States which will consider a new law to replace one already in effect include California, Connecticut, Missouri and Oklahoma. Dealing with revision or expansion of present laws will be Alaska, Indiana, Maine, Maryland, Michigan, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Washington and Wisconsin.

Thirty one states, at this writing, have some form of mandatory meet and confer or collective bargaining law for all or part of their education employes.

Six states have permissive coverage of a sort: Texas statutes permit consultation between teachers and school boards but forbid, public employe collective bargaining. New Hampshire statutes give local school boards the option to deal with teacher organizations but do not require such. Attorney generals' opinions in Kentucky, New Mexico and Virginia indicate that teachers in these states have the right to bargain; and in Illinois, a 1966 judicial ruling permits teachers and local employes to bargain.

While a majority of the states have faced the issue of collective bargaining for public education employes, a good number have not chosen to deal legislatively with the problem. This fact may have been the impetus for the introduction of federal collective bargaining bills in the past few years. Two of these bills are analyzed in this brief

As preparation of this book entered the final stage, it was learned that Representative Frank Thompson (D-N.J.) will introduce in the U.S. House of Representatives a compromise measure to allow public employes to bargain collectively, with states offering a better collective bargaining law exempted from the act. According to Education Daily (Jan. 22, 1975), all concerned groups will be offered an opportunity to review the measure before it is introduced.

Although passage of a federal collective bargaining bill appears likely, any action on the issue will probably be delayed until the new Thompson measure has cleared committees. The impact of a federal law upon state laws, affecting education would be widespread in those states that have little or no collective bargaining legislation on the books and certainly noticeable in those states with similar or stronger laws.

What kinds of state collective bargaining laws are already on the books? What are the major provisions of these laws? What constraints have been placed by the several states inpon completed collective bargaining agreements? Who may bargain? Are there state structures for implementation of collective bargaining laws?

What are bargainable items? Bargainable items (listed on the chart of state legislation in this brief under "Scope of Bargaining") are most often defined as wages, hours and terms and conditions of employment—a definition which could sweep across regulatory legislation already in state education codes—tenure, retirement, length of the teaching year, class size, sabbatical leaves, teacher training and evaluation, textbook selection, school district budgeting and state foundation plans, to name but a few

What about the accountability of the school system to students and parents? Do current collective bargaining laws enhance the nation's education system in general, or could they be improved? Tightened? Loosened? Much of what is done in the states will be governed by the action of Congress in its consideration of the federal collective bargaining bills before it

Usin state education codes, resource materials from the Bureau of National Affairs' Government Employee Relations Report and the resources of the ECS Research and Information Services Department, 45 state collective bargaining laws affecting education were examined, analyzed, and charted for this brief.

The meet and confer laws are distributed across the states as follows:

- One state, Kansas, has meet and confer coverage for all four types of education employes: professional K-12, classified K-12, professional postsecondary and classified postsecondary. Community college employes are specifically covered as well.
- Nine states, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Idaho, Kansas, Maryland, Nebraska, Vermont and Washington have meet and confer coverage for K-12 professional employes.
- Four states have meet and confer coverage for K-12 classified employes: California, Kansas, Maryland and Missouri
- Two states have meet and confer coverage for postsecondary professional employes. Delaware and Kansas.
- Two states have meet and confer coverage for postsecondary classified personnel. *Lansas and Missouri
- More states have passed collective bargaining laws, ranging from the narrow to the comprehensive
 - Eleven states have collective bargaining coverage for all four types of education employes. Florida (specifically includes community colleges), Hawaii, Iowa,

VIII

^{*}Without an extensive investigation of state structures, policies and interpretation of specific laws, identification of coverage for community college employes is difficult. ECS has identified here only those states which make direct mention of community college coverage. It is indeed possible that community colleges are covered in other state K-12, postsecondary or public employe collective flargaining laws by implication.

- Twenty states have collective bargaining coverage for K-12 professional employes: Alaska, Florida, Hawaii, Indiana, Iowa, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Dakota and Wisconsin.
- Eighteen states have collective bargaining coverage for K-12 classified employes: Florida, Hawaii, Iowa, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsvivania, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Vermont, Washington and Wisconsin.
- Eighteen states have collective bargaining coverage for postsecondary professional employes: Alaska, Florida (includes community colleges), Hawaii, Iowa, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, Naw Jersey, New York, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and South Dakota. Three states included within this classification have only partial postsecondary professional coverage: Vermont has coverage for state colleges only, Washington has coverage for community colleges only and Wisconsir has coverage for two-year institutions only.
- Eighteen states have collective pargaining coverage for postsecondary classified employes. Alaska, Florida (includes community colleges), Hawaii, Iowa, Maine, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Oregon, Pamsylvariia, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Washington and Wisconsin. Vermont, also included in this classification, has coverage for state colleges only. Although North Dakota has a dispute procedures law covering postsecondary classified employes and South Carolina has a grievance procedures law encompassing K-12 and postsecondary classified employes, these states are not included here.

The Effect of Federal Legislation on Public Employe Bargaining Rights

After almost 200 years of federalism in the United States, the separate and individual states are beginning to move, for the purposes of simplicity and expediency, to a more uniform system of laws. The proposal and acceptance of uniform codifications (e.g., the Uniform Commercial Code and the Uniform Probate Act) suggest the growth of this movement.

In some areas the crazy-quilt pattern still exists, and no area of laws is more different among the states than the state collective bargaining laws for public employes. But by the end of the 94th Congressional session in December 1976, public employe collective bargaining laws may yet be another example of nation wide uniformity.

Federal legislation has been introduced that could bring all state and municipal employes under a tederal labor relations structure. This paper examines the bills that might form the basis for this structure and looks at the effects this legislation would have at the state level.

The Federal Legislation and Committee Testimony

The first legislation in the current series of bills to be introduced was read in the first session of the 92nd Congress (1971-72) A number of hearings were held on the bills, but neither was reported out of the special subcommittee on labor. The same bills were reintroduced in the 43rd Congress in an effort by the sponsors to get as wide a range of input of ideas as possible. During the extensive hearings in 1973-74, the subcommittee heard from over 50 different groups thatwished to state a position on these fidls. But again, neither hill was voted on (for a list of witnesses who testified before the subcommittee, see Appendix II)

There have been two bills that were actually examined, and they represent the two major approaches that have been suggested in forming a structure to protect the bargaining rights of public employes at the state and local level. One of the bills is H.R. 86°° cosponsored by Representative William Clay of Missoin and Representative Carl Perkins of Kentucky and introduced in the Senate by Senator Harrison Williams of New Jersey as S. 3295. This bill, the Public Employment Relations Act (PERA), establishes a Public Employment Labor Relations Commission, a labor relations board not unlike the National Labor Relations Board that governs the collective bargaining structure in private sectors. PERA provisions, similar to the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA), include sections on the creation of a board to administer the act. a list of rights of employes, employe organization obligations, obligations of employers, definitions of unlawful practices, recognition and bargaining unit determination, procedures for negotiating a collective bargaining agreement and impasse procedures (for a summary of major provisions of H.R. 8677, see Appendix 1):

The other bill is H.R. 9730, sponsored by Representative Frank Thompson of New Jersey, and introduced in the Senate again by Senator Williams as S. 3294. The different tack that Thompson's bill takes is that it merely deletes a few words in the National Labor Relations Act. That deletion enables the public employe unions to come under the umbrella of the NLRB, using the same rules and procedures as private industry now uses.

Senator Williams' legislative aide explained why he introduced both bills his reasoning probably is shared by many other legislators on Capitol Hill. "The senator," the aide explained, "is in favor of legislation protecting the bargaining rights of state public employes but is unsure of which route to take in insuring those rights." Senator Williams therefore introduced both methods holding considerable popularity so as to get evidence and debate between the two views and to hear how the labor community reacts.

This is not to say that there has not been opposition to both of these bills. In fact, there was considerable opposition to even Congressional discussion of the proposals. Although some of the opposition was basic anti-unionism at any level, general objections to the bills include:

- 1. Public employes should not have the right to strike.
- 2. With unionization, public employes would control the public tax burdens, and taxes would go up in order to pay for collective bargaining demands.
- State public employe collective bargaining is an area that should be controlled by the states.
- 4. If the "employer" is the citizen, who can fairly and representatively bargain for him?
- 5. The merit system would disappear under the collective bargaining scheme.
- Unlike a private industry strike, the public has nowhere else to go for services if the public employes go on strike.

Proponents of a federal collective bargaining bill put forth a number of reasons why such a bill is necessary. Among these are

- The civil service system has failed to meet the needs of public employes and is not an acceptable substitute for collective bargaining.
- 2 The federal government is all eady playing such a large role in the state and local scene (i.e., education) that it is a logical extension of that role to protect the employes affected.
- 3 Collective bargaining agreements can be the basis for improvement of state administration or, in the case of education, for improvement of the education system

Education Commission of the States

4. Strikes by state public employes have effects nationwide, and federal legislation is needed to help avert labor disputes that would be a burden on interstate commerce.

The question of the right and/or the privilege to strike for public employes certainly raised the most emotional testimony on the bills. Opponents introduced data to show the increasing number of strikes by public employes and the number of citizens those strikes are affecting.

In an effort to counter that evidence, a number of witnesses contended that the majority of strikes, at least in the education sector, are recognition strikes—A.e., employes taking concerted action to withhold services because the employer refuses to allow establishment of a tepresentative bargaining unit for employes.

Representative Clay, one of the sponsors of the bill, contended that passage of this type of legislation would end recognition strikes by establishing procedures to insure the bargaining rights of public employes, and thus "would end the disruption of public services."

While recognition strikes may well disappear. Representative Clay and others agree that other strikes might still occur, but one of the intentions of such legislation is to discourage strikes. By introducing procedures to handle labor problems, the bill establishes uniformity of process among all public employes.

Helen Wise, past president of the National Education Association, agrees with Representative Clay and further states, that there are times when strikes by public employes should be allowed. Just as in the private sector, Wise points out, penalties do not deter strikes, and it is wrong to state that public strikes would necessarily be a greater harm to a community than private employe strikes. And while not all public employe strikes result in community emergencies, she felt that there is enough of a safeguard in the power of the courts to order employes back, to work when these emergencies result Representative Thompson, speaking in favor of his bill, points out that these same types of emergency procedures exist under the National Labor Relations Act and would be used in the same situations for public employes. Further, Representative Thompson states, teacher strikes do not come under this category because, while education is essential, teacher strikes do not create community emergencies. He agrees to the necessity of the judicial checking power but feels that this power should be used discreetly and only in times of actual emergency.

A great amount of testimony to the contrary has been presented, and the emotional issue of whether public employes should strike has been deeply explored. Some followers of the Washington scene are assuming that any bill coming out of committee will include the right to strike with the power of judicial intervention when necessary to curb that right.

Another of the widely disputed questions is whether this type of legislation is an area in which the federal government should be involved. Proponents for the bill argue that the federal government has a legitimate responsibility to develop a scheme to assure that all governmental services continue. The chaos that results from state public employe labor problems may affect the whole country, they feel.

Opponents do not feel that way Frank

LeSuer, president of the National Public Employer Labor Relations Association, testified that uniformity in this area was not only unnecessary and inappropriate but was also undesirable. He felt that if the states are diverse and separate, then each should control its public employes within its own structure.

LeSuer and others also questioned the legality of such legislation, but from the testimony before the committee, it seems quite clear that there is a legal basis for either H.R. 8677 or H.R. 9730. This legal basis was shown in two ways:

- 1. The Public Employment Relations Act that is created by H.R. 8677 is not unlike the National Labor Relations Act. The NLRA was held to be constitutional by the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Jones and Laughlin Steel, 301 U.S. 1 (1937). Further, the Supreme Court has held that "it is clear that labor conditions in schools and hospitals can affect commerce" and an extension to cover all public employes would be logical enough to bring their activity under the commerce power of Congress (Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. 183 [1968]).
 - 2. The ability of Congress to affect public employe salaries, benefits and other related conditions of employment has already been upheld by the recent action Congress took in imposing wage and price controls

Anticipated Effects of Legislation

The question of most concern to the subcommittee, and yet the question that was never fully answered in the hearings, is what the effects of such a bill would be on the American people. These discussions arose out of the wide-ranging interpretations that witnesses gave to Section 3(m) of H.R. 8677 and Section 8(d) of the NLRA, which would be used with the passage of H.R. 9730. These sections relate to the scope of negotiations and define it as follows:

- "3(m) The scope of negotiations is the terms and conditions of employment and other matters of mutual concern relating thereto."
- "8(d) The scope of negotiations between employers and representatives covers wages, hours and other terms and conditions of employment."

Opponents of the legislation fear the scope of bargaining is too broad and would produce numerous disputes during the bargaining process. Harold Lumb, representing the National Association of Manufacturers, goes further in stating that the terms of the section provide for union veto power over any management prerogatives.

Members of the subcommittee were also troubled with this possible problem area, but they felt, as Representative Marvin Esch of Michigan states, that "this is a point that is unfortunately misconceived by many individuals in the general public." The subcommittee was concerned but did not believe the section contained the veto powers of which Lumb spoke.

What, then, might be part of "conditions of employment and other matters of mutual concern". Topics suggested for the education sector might include:

- a. All salary matters, including dues deductions and union checkoff fees as provided in Section 5 of PERA, insurance deductions, salary schedules and coverage under federal social security laws.
 - b All retirement matters, including

minimum age and service required, pension benefits and retirement pay, employe retirement funds, and maximum teaching age

- c. Termination matters, including effects of decreasing full-time enrollment and/or budgetary problems on teacher employment, layoff and recall procedures, severance pay, and resignation procedures.
- d. Sabbaticals and leaves of absence, including jury duty and court appearances, sick leave and maternity leave, and personal or religious leave time.
- e. Professional release time, including attendance at education meetings and conferences, mileage and time allowances, exchange programs involving teachers, and inservice training programs
- f. School duties, including lunch room and playground duty and extracurricular and after-school assignments
- g Classroom management, including use of aides, paraprofessionals, student teachers and parents, classroom supplies and service maintenance
- h. Teaching matters, including class size, teaching load, available disciplinary actions and procedures, professional conduct codes and regulations for teachers, planning periods, assignment of teachers and subject matter, assignment of students
- i Contracts, including tenure achievement, dismissal and grievance procedures, evaluation and ment increases, individual contracts versus union contracts, length of employment including school year, holidays and required daily hours, bargaining and impasse procedures.

J. Governmental matters, including military and reserve duty, state inspection of health and safety, teacher certification and revocation of certificate, legal action against teachers, political contributions, running for public office and workmen's compensation.

From this incomplete list of possible bargaining topics, one can surmise that if these areas are accepted as bargainable issues, the budgets of school districts and states most definitely would be affected. The subcommittee was aware of this, as Section 3(m) of PERA included the term "the budget-making process" as a factor to be considered in collective bargaining.

The most obvious funding source for increased demands and higher settlements is the citizen through new and higher taxes. Proponents of the bill argue that taxes need not go up to support public employment collective bargaining rights. They prefer a reorganization of state hudgetary policies and have suggested a new method of accomplishing this Use the model most often used in the private sector with a long-term (two, three or four years) employment contract for public employes. This could introduce a different pattern of state budget making and could change fiscal policy considerations from an annual matter of discussion to a less frequent headache for state legislators

These long-term contracts (three-year) are already in use in some cities in the country. One of the witnesses before the subcommittee. Mayor Edward H. McNamara of Livonia, Mich., presented evidence to show that three-year contracts work well and planning and budgeting over longer periods of time are done with "greater accuracy" because of certainty of what "personnel-related costs.

will be." He went on to state that the citizens of Livonia, the state's fifth largest city, are "assured of a three-year period free from labor-disputes" and "can reasonably assume that city services will be maintained at stable levels."

Another point put forth by proponents of the three-year contract system is that if the state requires the school budget to be submitted before the state three-year budget is approved, negotiations in each school district must begin before the school district budget is finalized. This would give time for both sides to map out together the direction education in the district should take over the following three years. (Currently, only a few state laws include specific deadline dates for contract completion, as indicated in the state charts.)

These, then, are the types of immediate effects passage of a public employment relations act might produce. But what are the views down the road, 20 or 30 years from now?

Probably the most important effect that has been discussed could be the move to statewide school districts and the eventual abolishment of local school boards as budgetary institutions. This effect could result from three factors: The present use in some states of full, or nearly full, state funding of school construction; the courtordered move toward statewide equalization of operational costs, and the possibility of statewide public employe unions that would negotiate with the budgetary committee of the state legislature. The ultimate question, of course, is what effect all of this would have on the quality of education.

Appendix I: Major Provisions of Proposed Federal Collective Bargaining Statute

H.R. 8677

- 1. The statute would regulate the employment relationship between certain public employers (i.e., states, territories, and possessions of the United States and the political subdivisions thereof) and their employes
- 2. Administration of the statute would be by an impartial agency consisting of five members appointed by the President with the approval of the Senate. The commission's principal office would be in the District of Columbia, but it would be able to establish state and regional offices.
- 3. The commission would be responsible for interpreting, applying and enforcing the provisions of the statute, including the determination of all questions relating to employe representation, and would employ an executive director and others as required for it to carry out its functions. A general counsel for the commission would be appointed by the President with the approval of the Senate.

- 4 Fach employer would bargain over terms and conditions of employment and other matters of mutual concern exclusively with the employe organization thatrepresented a majority of the employes in an appropriate unit
- 5 An employe organization would be recognized as the exclusive representative if it was able to demonstrate its majority support through appropriate evidence. An election would be held if the commission concluded that other forms of evidence were not adequate to demonstrate majority support or if there were competing claims from two or more employe organizations.
- o Supervisors and nonsupervisors would be required to have separate bargaining units except in the case of firefighters, public safety officers and education employes. Education supervisors and nonsupervisors could be included in the same unit. but professionals and nonprofessionals would be required to have sepaarate bargaining units unless a majority desired inclusion in a single unit

- 7. All members of the bargaining unit who were not members of the recognized organization would be required, as a condition of continued employment, to pay to such organization an amount equal to the dues and assessments charged members.
- 8. An employer and a recognized organization would be permitted to enter into an agreement pursuant to which all members of the bargaining unit would be required, as a condition of continued employment, to become members of the recognized organization.
- Implesses in bargaining would be resolved as follows:
- a. A mediator would be appointed by the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service and would meet with the parties in an effort to effect a mutually acceptable agreement.
- b. If the mediator were not successful in resolving the dispute within a specified number of days after his appointment, a fact-finder with power to make findings of fact and to recommend terms of settlement would be selected by the parties or, if they were unable to agree upon a person, would be appointed by the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service. The recognized organization would decide whether the recommendations of the fact-finder would be binding or only advisory.
- 10 If the recommendations are to be binding, the recognized organization would be prohibited from engaging in a stoke If they are to be only advisory, the - organization would be enjoinable only to the extent that it posed a clear and present danger to the public health or safety or if the organization had not attempted to utilize impasse procedures.

- II. An employer and a recognized organization would be permitted to substitute their own impasse procedures for those provided in the statute.
- 12. Disputes involving the interpretation or application of the provisions of negotiated agreements could be submitted to binding arbitration pursuant to procedures set forth in such agreements or, in the absence of such procedures, could be submitted by either party to binding arbitration pursuant to the rules of the commission.
- 13. It would be unlawful for an employ-
- a. Impose reprisals or discriminate against an employe for exercising the rights guaranteed by the statute.
- b. Dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of an employe organization
- ship in an employe organization by discriminating in regard to hire, tenure or other terms and conditions of employment
- d Fail to bargain in good faith with a recognized organization
- e. Deny an employe organization a place to meet, access to work areas or the use of bulletin boards, mailboxes and other communication media, refuse to deduct membership dues for an employe organization, and conversely, once an organization had been recognized, it would be unlawful for an employer to grant these rights to any other employe organization.

- 14. It would be unlawful for an employe organization to:
- a. Attempt to cause an employer to commit an act prohibited by Section 13 above
- b. Restrain or coerce an employe in the exercise of the rights guaranteed by the statute or an employer in the selection of its bargaining representatives

- c. Fail to bargain in good faith if it has been recognized as the exclusive representative.
- 15. A charge that an act prohibited by Section 13 or Section 14 above had been committed could be filed with the commission and the commission would be empowered to deal with the matter.
- 16. If any state, territory or possession established statutory procedures for regulating employer-employe relations that were substantially equivalent to those provided in this statute, it would be permitted to operate under its own statute.
