ABSTRACT

State public employee collective bargaining laws affecting education are summarized in this booklet. State provisions and laws relative to coverage, exclusion, determination of bargaining units, union security, administrative roles, management rights, impasse procedures, grievance procedures, unfair practices, and deadline dates are compared. Provisions regarding open meeting requirements are discussed. The implementation of bargaining laws in 31 states are summarized and compared. An appendix describing impasse resolution procedures for professional educational personnel is provided, along with a glossary of terms. (JEH)

A particularly useful reference in the preparation of the state legislation chart was the Government Employee Relations Report published by the Bureau of National Affairs, Inc., Washington, D.C. Other basic information for this report was drawn from state education codes and special resources developed through the ECS Legislative Information System.

The research for this booklet was supported in part by state funds from the Education Commission of the States and pursuant to Contract No. 400-79-0044 of the National Institute of Education. The conclusions presented do not necessarily reflect the views or policies of these organizations.

Introduction

In 1980, many collective bargaining observers are claiming that the movement toward public employee bargaining—including bargaining by teachers and other education personnel—has cooled a bit. If one looks at the number of states that grant bargaining rights to teachers by law (32 including the District of Columbia), the claim probably has considerable validity. Since 1978, no "new" states have granted bargaining rights to education personnel.

However, bargaining activity continues. Public sector unions, a major portion of which are teacher organizations, continue to grow. According to the Bureau of National Affairs, 65.4 percent of the nation's public school teachers belong to employee organizations.

States without teacher bargaining laws are still being pressured by various interest groups to pass them. No state has rescinded teacher bargaining rights that have been granted by law. Contracts are still being bargained, both in states with bargaining laws and in those without them. And, significantly, states that have bargaining laws on the books are still tailoring them to the bargaining process that takes place in their states. For example, since 1978, Minnesota and Kansas have made major changes in their laws' provisions for the state-level implementation of the bargaining process.

State legislatures continue to debate the issues of impasse resolution and strikes. Connecticut has been experimenting with compulsory binding arbitration of bargaining impasse for over a year now, under amendments to its teacher bargaining law. One teacher strike has occurred during this period of time. Considerable debate in California has focused on differing interpretations of the teacher bargaining law's provisions, or lack of them, dealing with strike rights.

The purpose of this booklet is to provide the reader with an encapsulated view of state bargaining laws affecting education, along with a brief review of how states have chosen to handle the bargaining process. The review of the state-level implementation of teacher bargaining laws is a new feature of this booklet. It is based on an examination of documents solicited from state labor relations boards and agencies and on site visits to four very different states: New York, Minnesota, Kansas and California. A more detailed report on each of the states visited is available from ECS as a separate document: State Involvement in Education Labor Relations—A Report on Four States, at a cost of $5.

I. The Laws and the Chart

The Key

In the first column of the following charts, the name about the state as reference appear. Below each citation is an identification of the key, centered, is the type of coverage the law p and p and p are stated as a stated as a stated as p and p are stated as p and

- CB = Collective Bargaining: The process that parties, the employer and the designated employee containing agent, to perform mutual obligations aimed toward at all of a written and binding contract.
- MC = Meet and confer: The process that requires a parties, the employer and the employee represe ative, to consult together on matters defined by law. Agreements a photonecessarily binding and, generally, the employer has the right to make a final decision on the matters under discussion.

On the left side of the identification key is the level of education personnel covered:

- K-12 = Employees serving kindergarten through grade 12.
- PS = Employees serving at the college and university level.
- CC = Employees serving at the community college, or two-year institutional, level. CC is used only where the law specifically states that community colleges are covered. K-12 and PS designations frequently encompass the community college level, depending on state structures.

On the right side of the identification key is the employment level of covered personnel. For the purposes of the chart, the following symbols and definitions are used:

- P = Professional employee, generally, when applied to education personnel, means teachers or personnel with similar or higher status.
- C = Classified employee, generally, means one below the rank of teacher; i.e., clerk, food employee, bus driver, custodian, paraprofessional. Not to be confused with state-level classified personnel within a state civil service system.

Particular characteristics of each law examined are noted on the last line of the identification key. The terms used are:

State Level = a law with coverage for state-level employees only.

Local Level = A law with coverage for local-level employees only.

).₁

Omnibus = A law with coverage for employees at more than one governmental level.

In addition, this column notes the date of enactment of each law, and the date of its last amendment. It is probable, that not all 1980 amendments have been incorporated into the charts, since this book was completed before the end of 1980.

Three states have laws with limited coverages that are not common to other states. California has a special law for postsecondary (university) employees only. Washington has a special law for community college personnel only. Maine has a separate law that covers both community college and university personnel. These have been noted in the chart.

Organization of the Laws

While the states that have bargaining laws on their books for K-12 and/or postsecondary teachers have a common purpose—that of granting bargaining rights to such public employees—in enacting such laws, the structure and comprehensiveness of the laws varies widely from state to state. Some are short and nonspecific in their treatment of the bargaining process and others are very long and extremely detailed. The order in which the various provisions appear is not consistent across states, either. In some laws it is even necessary to read through the entire law to pull out all the provisions for a specific area. The chart in this book has been organized with headings loosely representing the various steps in the process of collective bargaining, and arranged in essentially the same order as the steps in the bargaining process. The following discussion will explain each category in more detail than was possible to include on the chart, and includes some categories that do not appear on the chart.

Statement of Intent or Declaration of Policy

This category is not included on the chart. A majority of the state collective bargaining laws covering K-12 and/or postsecondary teachers begins with a statement of intent or declaration of policy. Generally this is an overarching statement that lays the groundwork for the provisions of the Act. It is in this portion of the law that the legislature indicates its concern for efficient and orderly employer-employee relations as they affect the optimal operation of government, and its recognition that government employees are entitled to a voice in the terms and conditions of their employment. Often this statement of intent is examined carefully and used as a basis for rulings on disputes arising out of the collective bargaining process by labor relations agencies, public employment relations beards and courts—as well as for attorney general opinions. Twenty-three states preface one or more of their education bargaining laws with this kind of statement.

Coverage, Exclusions

In this column the types of education personnel that are covered by each law are noted, along with those categories of education employees that are excluded. In all cases an attempt is made to indicate which education employees—at what levels—are covered by the collective bargaining rights detailed in each law.

Many of the state laws contain a section for definition of terms. It is these definitions that usually refine and detail the coverage of the law. For example, if the law is for most public employees at all levels of government, it will say that the employer for bargaining purposes is the state and/or its political subdivisions

(which includes school districts). Therefore, we infer that school district employees and postsecondary employees are covered unless additional provisions specifically exclude them. If the law is for K-12 education bargaining only, it will define the employer as the school district governing board. If the law covers postsecondary faculty, the employer may be defined as the state, a state post-secondary governing board or even specific institutional governing boards. Another way to determine coverage is to review the definition of employee, which may pinpoint those who are not to be considered employees for the purposes of the Act.

It is a rare state that does not include at least some definitions in its bargaining laws, but there is a wide variance in the number of terms defined and in the explicitness of the definitions. The number of definitions can range from less than three to a dozen or more. I and touch on areas where a precise understanding of terminology is essential to the implementation, administration and interpretation of the law. A careful reading of these definitions is required, not only to understand the coverage of the law, but the other sections of the law as well.

Recognition Procedures

This category is not included on the chart. Unit recognition procedures are the framework through which an employer "recognizes" or agrees to negotiate with a defined group of employees—a bargaining unit—who are represented by a union. Requirements for recognition vary from state to state, and range from a local, informal acceptance of the "bargaining representative" (the union to which the bargaining unit is affiliated) and the specific group of employees (unit) to be represented, to more complex state-level procedures. Virtually all state bargaining laws provide that bargaining units be accorded the status of exclusive representative.2 These laws generally provide procedures that must be followed in order to attain that status. Prospective exclusive representatives (for the bargaining units) must provide to employers or designated state-level agencies some form of proof of employee support, or showing of interest.3 This often takes the form of the submission of signature cards or signed petitions that represent from 25 or 30 percent to a simple majority of the total number of employees, both union and nonunion, who would be represented by the bargaining unit. If the acceptable percentage of the employees indicates support for the unit; if another union does not challenge the petition for recognition by also seeking representation rights; if those employees who are not members of the union do not indicate. that they wish to challenge the petition and if the designated unit composition is accepted by the employer, recognition may occur. But the process does not necessarily end here. Some states—even in the absence of a challenge and with the presence of a perfectly acceptable and appropriate unit-require secretballot elections to be held before a union is officially recognized as a bargaining agent. These elections may be conducted and/or supervised locally or at the state level. They always must be conducted if the employer doubts that the union (employee organization) has enough employee support to warrant recognition. or when two or more unions petition for representation rights for the same group of employees. In the latter case, the first union petitioning for recognition must show more support than a challenging union; but even challenging unions must be able to show a minimum of 10 or 15 or 20 percent employee support in order to get on the ballot.4 Almost always, employees voting in a secret-ballot election for representation are accorded the choice of "no representation" on the ballot. In most states, if one union does not get a clear majority of the votes, run-off elections must be held.

Bargaining Unit, Union Security

Election results will either grant bargaining rights to a specific union or will show that a majority of employees do not wish bargaining rights at all. When a union has secured approval of the composition of the unit at either the state or local level and, if required, subsequently wins an election, it is declared the exclusive representative of the employees in the unit. Since all states provide for exclusive representation and multi-unit recognition is the rare exception, this facet of union security - exclusive representation - is not noted on the chart.

The union is guaranteed the rights of an exclusive representative for its certified (approved) unit for a specified period of time: one, two or three years, for example, or the duration of a contract (agreement). It may not be challenged until the specific time period is close to expiration, or if it loses its certification because it has violated the law or its bargained contract. In a number of states a union may lose its rights as an exclusive representative if it commits certain unfair practices or engages in an illegal strike.

The composition of the bargaining units is regulated by state law, and again provisions for unit determination range from the vague and amorphous, to criteria for determination, to specific units named and detailed in the law. A number of states further refine their control of unit composition by detailing in their laws the kinds of employees who may or may not be included in specific units. For example, a majority of states require that professional and nonprofessional employees be in separate units, or that supervisors and nonsupervisors have separate units. Most states use common criteria for unit determination.

Employee Organization Rights and Responsibilities

Once an employee organization is recognized and the unit is certified as appropriate, as a rule it is accorded certain rights that go with its status as exclusive representative. These, like other provisions in the laws, vary from state to state; and may be as minimal as the basic immunity to challenge for stipulated periods of time, or may include requirements for the employer to provide meeting places for the unit, mail boxes and time off for those involved in negotiations. Further union security is provided in many laws that permit, or in a few cases require, the employer to deduct union dues (dues checkoff) from employees' paychecks. In addition, some of these laws permit a union to collect service fees (in the amount of union dues or in specified or proportionate amounts linked to legitimate costs of representation) from nonunion members who are represented by the bargaining unit.

In a few states, for example, Montana, Oregon and Washington, individuals may be granted a religious exemption from the payment of service fees to the organization, but must donate an equivalent amount of money to a nonreligious charity and furnish proof of such a donation. Other states, i.e., Iowa and Massachusetts, out constraints on the use of these service fees by the organization receiving them. lowa provides penalties for the use of such fees to make "any direct or indirect contribution out of the funds of the employee organization to any political. party or organization or in support of any candidate for elective office" (this, of course, applies to union dues too). Massachusetts specifies that employees may demand a "rebate of that part of said employee service payment, if any, that represents a pro rata share of expenditures by the organization or its affiliates for: (1) contributions to political candidates or political committees formed for a candidate or political parties; (2) publicizing of an organizational preference for a candidate for political office; (3) efforts to enact, defeat, repeal or amend legislation unrelated to the wages, hours, standards or productivity and performance and other terms and conditions of employment, and the welfare or the working environment of employees represented by the exclusive bargaining agent or its affiliates; (4) contributions to charitable, religious or ideological causes not germane to the governance or duties as bargaining agent or its affiliates and available only to the members of the employee organization." Other states also provide that union dues and service fees that are inappropriately used may be challenged and rebated. A few state laws provide for "maintenance of membership," where an employee who is a member of a union must remain a member of the union for the duration of the current contract. If service fees, also known as fair-share fees or agency shop fees, are collected, an agency shop exists. When all employees represented by the union must be members of the unit, a union shop exists, and this is probably the tightest form of union security. Public employee laws in Alaska, Oregon and Pennsylvania permit union shops:

Middle-Management Provisions

Over the past few years the issue of collective bargaining rights for administrators, supervisors and other middle-level personnel has received increasing attention. Unlike the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA) for private employees, about two-thirds of the states with education bargaining laws provide bargaining rights for at least some middle-level personnel—either by granting such rights directly in their laws, or by failing to exclude supervisors from coverage. These rights are sometimes carefully circumscribed by the definitions sections of state laws, which most often use the NLRA definition of supervisor so that a determination can be made of who is and who is not a supervisor. Some of the state laws further control supervisor or middle-management bargaining rights by defining management personnel and administrative personnel and even-naming specific job titles for inclusion or exclusion in bargaining units. Of the 31 states that provide bargaining rights to professional education personnel, 24 provide such rights for supervisors, and five of these grant these rights to certain management personnel.

Most frequently these state laws require that supervisors and management bargain in separate units, but there are some states that permit these personnel to be included in lower-level units under certain conditions. Tennessee, the latest state to join those states that have bargaining laws for education personnel (1978), wrote an unusual provision for management personnel into its new law. The law specifies that "the board of education may designate and certify specific individuals as management personnel," who will be allowed to retain membership in the bargaining unit, but not for negotiating purposes; and indeed who may be appointed to represent the board of education in negotiation activities. In Maryland a similar approach is used: principals may be placed on management bargaining teams.

Administration

States, in their handling and implementation of their public employment collective bargaining laws, resort to a variety of techniques for their administration. These range from local administration of the law (with the school board, for example, establishing rules and regulations for unit determination and conduct of bargaining) to administration by fairly sophisticated state-level boards and agencies, such as the Public Employment Relations Board (PERB) structured by the New York law. These state-level boards and agencies become the funnel through which all procedures must pass, and exercise a quasi-judicial capacity with rulings on representation cases, disputed unit determinations and unfair practices. Regardless of the complexity of the administrative structure, however, in all states the courts are available at various points in the process and most certainly as a last resort. The trend in this area appears to be that of placing parts or all of the process under the jurisdiction of a public employment relations board (PERB), modeled to some degree on the National Labor Relations Board. Responsibilities outlined in the state laws vary for these boards. They may include overseeing elections for unit recognition, determination of unit composition, assistance with the settlement of bargaining impasse disputes, grievance procedures and resolution, and rulings on unfair practices and appeal processes. A more extensive discussion of the subject will be found on page 51 of this book.

Scope of Bargaining, Management Rights

The scope of bargaining encompasses those items that are actually put on the bargaining table for negotiation. Historically, this has been identified as wages, hours and terms and conditions of employment; and this phrase or a very similar one is what delineates the scope in many states. Over the past few years, however, a number of states have seen fit to define the term more clearly in their laws. They have gone so far as to list specific items that must be bargained, along with other specific items that may not be bargained. On the chart, provisions for mandatory scope are shown almost exactly as they appear in state laws.

Interpretation of these portions of state laws has been a continuing challenge. When disputes acise over items that should or should not be placed on the bargaining table as wages, hours and terms and conditions of employment, or on items on which the law is silent, the legal scope of bargaining must be further pinpointed by decisions from a public employment relations board, some other state administrative agency, the courts or attorneys general. These are some of the ways in which the scope of bargaining in the states is expanded or limited or refined.

Management rights that are listed and/or described in state laws restrict the scope of bargaining through exclusion. These rights generally deal with the policy-making functions of management, particularly those that are granted by statute or ordinance; or that are related to the direction of the employees and the operation of the agency or institution or government office; and overall budgetary matters.

Another approach to limiting scope of bargaining can be found in sections of the state laws that provide what or what not a contract may contain. These provisions may exclude from contracts areas covered by statute; may protect federal aid programs from being affected by bargained contracts or may provide for legislative acceptance or rejection of cost-items in contracts which, if rejected, would be subjected to renegotiation. An attempt has been made in the charts to comment on these provisions.

As noted above, a special effort has been made to carefully detail the mandatory scope of bargaining in the appropriate column. The reader should be aware, however, that extended definitions of scope always are found outside the statutes. For example, the New Jersey Public Employment Relations Commission has decided over 150 scope-of-negotiations oases since 1975.

Bargaining Impasse Resolution Procedures

Provisions for bargaining impresse procedures differ from state to state, from extremely detailed structures and processes that take many paragraphs in the law to almost casual treatment. Sometimes procedures for handling impasse are developed and/or expanded by the public employment relations board, or some other state or labor relations agency. Sometimes they are worked out by the bargaining parties within a loose legal framework. Accepted procedures for dealing with impasse may be divided into three steps: mediation, fact-finding and arbitration. State laws provide for one or more of these steps and/or give the bargaining parties the authority to work out their own procedures.

Mediation is the process that is universally instituted first after an impasse is declared. The parties select a mediator or panel of mediators (or one is appointed by a state-level agency) to assist them in a resolution of their differences. The mediator works with both parties separately, or together, reasoning, coaxing, suggesting compromises, pointing out possible trade-offs and generally making every possible effort to mediate or conciliate the dispute. In certain bargaining laws covering education personnel provide for the use of some form of arbitrasis moved along to the fact-finding process.⁶

Fact-finding is a term that is almost self-explanatory. After mediation has failed, in most instances a fact-finder will be selected by the parties or appointed pursuant to procedures outlined in the law to gather together all of the facts that are relevant to the dispute, to analyze them and to make recommendations for settlement based on the evidence provided by the facts. If the fact-finding recommendations are rejected, about two-thirds of the states with bargaining laws covering education personnel provide for the use of some form of arbitration, in which the final decision on the dispute is made by a third party or parties selected jointly by the disputing parties or appointed by a state-level agency. For the other one-third of the states, the fact-finding process is the last step outlined in the law.

Provisions for interest arbitration (a term for resolution of contract disputes, not to be confused with grievance arbitration) vary from state to state. The most common approach is to provide that the parties may agree to binding interest arbitration at the time of contract negotiation, or at the time of impasse. This is voluntary arbitration. A few states, i.e., Maine, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island restrict arbitration awards to certain items only—like those that are mandatory negotiable items, or those that do not involve funding or costs. Delaware law flatly prohibits arbitration of K-12 contract disputes. The strongest provisions for arbitration are those that make the procedure compulsory either by law or at the initiative of the state agency administering the law. Connecticut and Wisconsin have laws that make arbitration truly compulsory for both parties. Some of the other laws, for example lowa, provide for binding arbitration at the request of either party, thus making it a compulsory process for at least one of the parties.

Grievance Procedures

Often grievances are defined in state laws as complaints by either party related to the application and/or interpretation of a bargained agreement. Provisions in most state laws grant public employees the right to discuss and/or file grevance complaints whether or not related to the application and /or interpretation of the agreement, as individuals, not necessarily represented by the employee bargaining unit, but in a majority of cases with a representative of the bargaining unit informed or present. Most of the state laws allow for or require the inclusion in bargained agreements of procedures for the resolution of grievance complaints. And because a number of the state laws list "failure to comply with the terms of a bargained agreement" as an unfair practice, procedures for resolution of unfair practice charges may also be used as grievance procedures in those states.

Unfair Practices, Strikes and Penalties

Provisions listing unfair practices may be short or lengthy, but the overall intent of such provisions is essentially the same across the states. Many of the laws contain nearly identical descriptions that broadly or specifically cover the range of unfair practices. Unfair or prohibited practices are sometimes delineated in two listings; one for the employer and one for the employee organization. Generally an employer is prohibited from interfering with the employees' and/or the employee organization's rights under the bargaining law, hiring and employment discrimination, dismissal of employees because they exercise their rights under the law, communication with employees other than through their authorized representatives during the bargaining process, refusal to bargain in good faith and violations of written contracts. Employees or employee organizations generally are prohibited from interfering with the employer's or individual employees' rights under the law, communication with employer officials other than through the designated bargaining agent during the negotiations process, refusal to bargain in good faith and violations of written contracts.

Some state laws list illegal strikes by employees and lockouts by employers as unfair practices. Only a few states permit strikes by education employees. In no case is this strike permission uncogditional. See Appendix A.

Some of the state laws not only list unfair practices but provide procedures for dealing with them. Usually the provisions in the law require an investigation of the charges of unfair practice, a determination of which if any laws or rules or agreements have been violated and a decision as to who is at fault. At this point either a dismissal of the charges is required, or some form of cease-and-desist order must be issued. Unfair practice charges may be handled by a state-level administrative agency or a PERB or may go directly to the courts, depending on the state.

Penalties for the commission of unfair practices vary widely. In some states employees or employers face fines for continuing violation of state agency stop orders or court injunctions. A number of states permit the application of discipline and even jailing of employees engaged in illegal unfair practices and/or strikes. Rights of appeal are almost universally granted.

Final Form, Deadline Dates

In this column there are notes that indicate whether or not a bargained agreement must be reduced to a written contract. If there is a specified time limit for contracts to run, and if contracts must be completed by special dates or at a certain point in a time line for budget completion, this information is also included.

. Comments

Miscellaneous information that may be useful to the reader is placed in the comments column. This includes notes on other state public employment bargaining laws that do not apply to education, court cases that are relevant to one or more of the columns in the chart, attorneys general opinions, stipulations for legislative body approval of bargained agreements and special provisions for postsecondary student participation in the bargaining process.

Postsecondary student participation in the bargaining process that takes place for the institutions they attend is probably the earliest offspring of the move over the past ten years or so toward bargaining in the sunshine (discussed in the next section). While it is possible and even probable that students participate in the bargaining process in institutions in states that do not grant them such statutory rights, only a few states, Alaska, Florida, Maine, Montana and Oregon, provide such privileges in their education bargaining laws. Perhaps the word "participation" is a misnomer since the student or students selected for involvement in the process are not granted voting rights. What they are given is an opportunity to sit in on the negotiating sessions, to have access to the written materials related to the sessions, to comment during the sessions on the matters under discussion and to meet and confer with both parties prior to the completion of a written contract. Most often these students must observe the rules of confidentiality.

Open Meeting Provisions

In the 1978 issue of "Cuebook" open meeting provisions were included in the charts. They have been removed from the charts for this edition (but not excluded from the book) for two reasons: (1) to provide a little more space on the charts, and (2) because many of the state laws for public employment bargaining do not contain these provisions—which may be found in other sections of the state statutes dealing with open meetings and records.

Open meeting laws were passed so that the public could have an opportunity to be present at, to observe and to monitor the discussions and decisions of public governing boards, commissions, agencies and other bodies. The several states have chosen differing approaches in their application of their open meeting laws to the bargaining process. These are noted in the state-by-state listing on page 48.

The subject has been controversial over the last decade, and continues to stimulate pro and con discussion. "Purists" claim often that the bargaining process is not suited to the open meeting concept, and that the delicate give-and-take atmosphere of proposals and counterproposals, compromise and trade-off, is stifled in an open session or in sessions where a third nonbargaining observer or participant is present. Those on the other side of the fence point to the public interest in government and education employee bargaining, and claim that school boards, for example, do not adequately represent that interest at the bargaining table.

The section above noted that postsecondary students sometimes may be a third party at the bargaining table. In some bargaining situations that third party may be a parent, sitting in as an observer or as a limited participant in bargaining sessions between school boards and teachers. One of the best publicized examples of parent participation in the bargaining process was in Syracuse, New York, where, in 1977, the school district placed a parent representative on its negotiating team. This representative was immersed in nine months of hard bargaining which included mediation sessions before the school board and the teachers arrived at a mutually satisfactory agreement.

While state laws have not specifically mandated parent participation in the bargaining process, this trilateral concept has been explored in other school districts in other states, i.e., New York, Pennsylvania and Florida. There is a fair amount of information available on the subject of open bargaining, but this book will do no more than note the provisions for open and closed bargaining sessions in states that have education employment collective bargaining laws. The listing on page 48, validated by review by state labor relations agencies, will provide the reader with limited basic information.

- ¹Laws in Connecticut, Idaho, Maryland, Michigan, Missouri, Oklahoma and Rhode Island have three or fewer definitions. The Nebraska teacher law contains no definitions. The Minnesota Public Employment Labor Relations Act has 19
- ²One exception to this rule is the Minnesota Public Employment Labor Relations Act which provides for exclusive representation rights to bargaining representatives, but additionally provides for joint representation of two unions representing portions of the same group of employees, and requires them to form a committee for bargaining purposes. This is multi-unit bargaining.
- ³A few states require considerably more than a show of interest and an election for an organization to qualify for designation as exclusive representative. For example, Florida, Hawaii and Nevada require employee organizations to register with a state agency or board. The amount of information required in these registrations varies from state to state. Florida probably has the most extensive provisions for registration.
- Idaho, presumably in order to avoid capricious challenges in the union recognition process, requires organizations who wish to be on the ballot in a representation election to pay a $250 "filing fee" which is refunded only if the organization gets more than 15 percent of the vote.
- ⁵The Scope of Negotiations: A Threat to Public Education? (Trenton, New Jersey; New Jersey School Boards Association, 1980), p.3.
- In Maryland, bargaining impasse resolution procedures in the law stop at mediation. Certain laws in Ataska, Main: sachusetts, Minnesota, Nebraska, Rhode Island and South Dakota either do not require the fact-finding step or provide that it may be waived.

V. State Level Implementation of Bargaining Laws

In 1980 there are 31 states (plus the District of Columbia) with bargaining laws that cover elementary/secondary teachers alone, and there are probably at least 31 different ways in which the state-level administration of these laws can be handled. Five of the states with teacher bargaining laws avoid state involvement for the most part. Three states provide for some administration by the state education agency or state board of education. Eight states have assigned the process to a state entity or agency that existed before the onset of teacher bargaining (five of them are agencies that handle private labor relations as well and three are agencies devoted only to the public sector.) About half — 15 — of the states with bargaining laws have provided governing structures (11 with exclusively public responsibilities and 4 with private sector assignments as well) commonly known as public employment relations boards (PERBs) or labor relations commissions. These facts are revealed by an examination of the state bargaining laws for teachers and other public employees. See the chart beginning on page 16.

But the situation is not that simple. A closer look at the boards, commissions and agencies reveals that the state-level administration of K-12 teacher bargaining is sometimes spread over a number of agencies or special entities, in compliance with state law, by delegation, memo of agreement or contract. Further, public employment relations boards vary widely in composition, structure and responsibilities—much more so than long-established state labor relations agencies.

PERBs have from three to five members who are most often appointed by the governor with senate confirmation, and who may take an active full-time part in the administration of teacher and/or other public employee bargaining, or who may be part-time public servants whose involvement is limited to, for example, hearing appeals on certain kinds of decisions issued by agencies more actively enmeshed in the bargaining process.

Criteria for selection as a PERB member varies from state to state. Some states require that board members be broadly representative of the public; some require that they have expertise or background in labor relations; some require that representation on the board be divided among those who are labor oriented, those who are management oriented, and those who may be perceived as neutral, etc. Terms on almost all of the boards are set for a specific number of years, and are staggered to insure continuity.

In some states careful provisions are made in the law to insure the autonomy and independence of the PERB, and in other states such provisions are minimal. Providing for autonomy and independence, of course, is much easier when a special board, commission or agency is set up than it is when the administation of public employee bargaining is assigned to an agency that is already a part of state government and that has additional responsibilities either within or outside of the public sector.

In an effort to better understand the structure and operation of the statelevel agencies and boards that administer K-12 teacher bargaining, we selected four states for on-site visits and interviews. In selecting these states, we considered the following criteria:

- 1. Geographical location
- 2. Type of bargaining law
- 3. Degree of state-level involvement in the administration of the law
- 4. Degree of maturity of bargaining activity
- 5. Types and numbers of state entities involved in the bargaining process
- Travel constraints.

The states selected were:

New York: The state level administration of public employee bargaining is almost totally in the hands of one agency, the Public Employment Relations Board (PERB). Public employee bargaining relationships have been well-established over the past 13 years. Strikes are prohibited.

Minnesota: The state has a fairly comprehensive public employment bargaining law and bargaining relations have been conducted under it for the past nine years. Administration of the law is split three ways among a PERB, the state Bureau of Mediation Services and the courts. Certain strikes are permitted.

The state is working with a law that was enacted in 1975 for K-14 education personnel, and which replaced a meet and confer law. Administration is divided two ways, between a PERB and the State Mediation and Conciliation Service. Strike activity may or may not be "protected."

Kansas:

The state is undergoing rapid changes in the administration and conduct of K-14 teacher bargaining. Professional employees of school districts do not bargain under a public employee law. There is a special law for them, with a separate administrative process. In the past few years, this administration has moved rapidly from implementation primarily at the local level with some state education agency involvement, through an administrative split between the state labor relations agency and the courts, to primary administration by the state's single, and very small, labor relations agency.

New Jersey, Wisconsin, and Pennsylvania, all major bargaining states worthy of investigation, were not selected for special investigation because the state-level entities within them that handle bargaining relationships have recently been subjected to an intense evaluation. The reports emanating out of the evaluations were made available to us by the Public Employment Relations Services, Albany, New York, and were used as background information, providing valuable insight to us for our investigation.

Prior to embarking on the site visits, an interview guide was developed to provide a skeletal framework for the areas of information we wished to cover. These areas included:

- 1. The structure of the board and/or agency
- 2. The organization and assignment of staff
- 3. The internal decision-making process
- 4. The functions executed by the board or agency
- 5. The process followed in handling key points in bargaining relationships
- 6. Policies, procedures, style and neutrality

With these basic areas in mind, and in fact, with cue cards in hand, we conducted our interviews, limiting them to two hours for the most part. All of the persons interviewed were extremely cooperative and discussed their operations freely. The interview style was passive. After a preliminary explanation of what we wanted to know, we assumed a nondirective stance, saying in essence, "Tell me about your operation." We confined our interruptions in the interview to questions designed to keep the interviewee on track and request for clarification or expansion. In all of the interviews, areas came up that were not listed on our cue cards, and we used our own judgment to either redirect the conversation or to permit it to continue, depending on the significance of the topic to the overall investigation. Thus, while the basic information sought is fairly well covered in each of the state reports, parts of each report cannot be compared or contrasted with the other reports. Indeed, it is difficult to make many valid comparisons from state to state because of the vast differences among them.

Each interviewee had an opportunity to review and comment on the reports in draft form, and they were subsequently amended before being put into final form. These final interview reports are much too lengthy to include in this book, but information from them will be unthroughout this discussion. The full reports, State Involvement in Education Labor Relations: A Report on Four States, are available from the Education Commission of the States, Department of Research and Information, at a cost of $5. Basic information on the involvement of state-level boards and agencies in public employee bargaining is noted on the charts on the following pages. Discussion focused on the four states follows the charts.

New York

Of the four states that were examined, probably the most sophisticated structure for the administration of public employee bargaining is in New York where control of the process is centered on a single board, served by its own staff. The Public Employment Relations Board has a full-time chairman (named by the governor) and two part-time members who are appointed by the governor for staggered six-year terms. The law establishing the public employment relations board requires only that its members be representative of the public, that they hold no other public office or employment, and that no more than two be of the same political party. But Ralph Vatalaro, interviewed in April 1980, was high in his praise of present and past board members who, he said, have all been professional labor relations practitioners. In addition, Vatalaro said that each governor has made appointments to the board with an eye toward insuring board neutrality, fairness and integrity.

The board administers a comprehensive law that covers most public employees in the state. A staff of 54 professional and support persons, mostly housed in a non-state building in Albany, New York, serves the board. There are a few staff members in satellite offices in New York City and Buffalo.

When compared to most PERBs, the New York board/agency is old and experienced, having been in operation for some 13 years. Operating procedures have been highly refined, and staff members appear to be competent and experienced.

Essentially the agency is divided into five sections: the employment practices and representation section deals, of course, with representation disputes, makes unit composition decisions and conducts and supervises representation elections. In addition, this section processes unfair practice charges. The conciliation section quite obviously provides-impasse resolution assistance. The three other sections are the legal services unit, the administrative services unit and the research unit. Board members themselves serve as an appellate body for decisions and rulings issued either by them or by agency staff members. In addition, the board has the responsibility of imposing mandatory penalties for strikes, illegal in New York. The board and agency staff view as their primary mission the resolution of disputes in the public sector.

Minnesota

Minnesota's public employee bargaining law is comprehensive and includes K-12 teachers in its coverage. The Minnesota PERB will provide the reader a dramatic contrast to the New York board. It is skeletal by comparison, being served by only one full-time staff member, Claudia Hennen, executive secretary (interviewed in May, 1980).

The Minnesota PERB's primary function is that of an appeals tribunal, and it handles 25 to 30 appeals related to unit determination and fair share fees only; "not many" of these are from the education sector. The PERB's limited responsibilities do include the development of rules and regulations to oversee the public employee bargaining process, and the maintenance of a list of arbitrators for use by public bargaining parties.

The board is composed of five members who are appointed by the governor, and who serve four-year overlapping terms. The statute requires that two of the members represent labor, two of them represent management, and one represents the general public as a neutral. They are all part-time public servants who meet as a board at least once a month.

The major portion of the work involved in the administration of public employee and K-12 teacher bargaining relationships is handled by the Bureau of Mediation Services (BMS), which is directed by Peter Obermeyer (interviewed in May, 1980). The services of the bureau to the PERB are provided for in the law, and most of the legal references are to the director of the BMS. This mediation agency was originally established to administer private employment relations and still does. The agency plays a role in recognition and representation disputes, unit composition disputes, the conduct and supervision of elections, impasse resolution and fair share fee ques-

In order to execute these responsibilities, the director employs a staff of 25, who are divided into four major units: a representation unit under the direction of a chief hearing officer; a mediation unit guided by a coordinator; an education (for bureau staff and general public) unit and an administration unit. Obermeyer sees as the primary mission of his agency the promotion of harmonious public employment relations within the

Unfair practice charges are routed through the Minnesota court system.

California

Instead of a comprehensive public employment bargaining law, the state of California has a number of specific laws under which public employees bargain. K-14 teachers are covered under the Education Employment Relations Act. It was this 1975 act that first set up the Public Employment Relations Board in California (initially named the Education Employment Relations Board, and as bargaining rights were expanded in California, renamed the Public Employment Relations Board). Specifically, the board is responsible for three of the state bargaining laws: the teacher law, a higher education law, and a state employee law (declared unconstitutional in 1980). Other public bargaining laws are admininstered by the State mediation and Conciliation Service (SMCS), and because the California teacher bargaining law prohibits the employment of neutrals (mediators, factfinders and arbitrators) by the PERB, the SMCS supplies these neutrals to the parties at the request of the PERB, under a memo of agreement.

The California PERB has three members who are appointed by the governor for five-year staggered terms. They serve in their positions on a full-time basis; and aside from a prohibition from holding other jobs, there are no particular qualifications laid out for board members in the law, nor is there a method outlined by which the governor makes his selections. A staff of 105 employees serves the board, and is dispersed through four locations: a main office and a separate regional office in Sacramento, and regional offices in San Francisco and Los Angeles.

The agency functions in two major areas, according to Janet Caraway, chief of operations (interviewed in June 1980). The representation area includes requests for recognition, interventions, decertification, unit modifications, requests to conduct organizational security elections, public notice complaints, compliance issues, mediation, fact-finding and arbitration. The other major area is unfair practice charges. A function of the board members themselves permeates both areas, and involves board approval of requests for injunctive relief in the case of work stoppages or lockouts, and requests for judicial review of board or agency decisions.

The regional offices are set up to handle both the representation and the unfair practice function. The main office houses board members, board counsel (attorneys), general counsel (an attorney), and a central division of judges (attorneys) who oversee and administer unfair practice procedures handled by additional attorneys in the regional offices. In addition, the PERB executive director and staff in the management services division are housed in the main office. The agency that serves the board is structured to perform as a neutral agency in every sense of the word. Said Caraway, "We do not have a branch of the agency that acts as prosecutor in any manner."

Kansas

The Kansas structure for administration of K-12 teacher bargaining is certainly the smallest of those that were examined. In Kansas, there is a public employment relations law that is administered by a public employee relations board, but this board is not involved in the administration of K-14 teacher bargaining—this area is assigned to the Secretary of Human Resources, who has delegated the task to his labor relations chief. However, the administration of both laws does come together in a sense under the Secretary, whose department houses both The Public Employee Relations Board and the Labor Relations Section of the Division of Labor-Management Relations. The administrative work of both teacher and other public employee labor relations is focused essentially in one man, Jerry Powell (interviewed in August 1980), who serves as both labor relations chief, with a variety of tasks, and executive director for the Public Employee Relations Board. Thus, the administration of all public bargaining in the state of Kansas is, essentially, in his hands. He is currently assisted by a staff of two: a conciliator and a secretary; and will within the next few months hire an additional conciliator and a clerktypist in order to handle responsibilities that have grown in just a few years from only the mediation area to encompass both the representation area and the unfair practice function.

Powell is a civil service employee who reports both to the Secretary of Human Resources (for K-14 teacher bargaining) and to the Public Employee Relations Board (for other public employee bargaining). His position was classified as civil service because initially it was felt he would need that protection if he were to perform effectively as a neutral. He indicated that he had so far found such protection unnecessary.

The Labor Relations Section is located in a private office building along with other offices attached to the Secretary of Human Resources in downtown Topeka.

Powell stated that the major portion of the work of the labor relations section is devoted to the K-14 teacher area. But, in addition to handling relations for other public employees, he is responsible for agricultural labor relations, state labor-management relations, private employment agencies and the child labor law. As directed by law, he uses the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service (FMS) for formal mediation services. He also maintains lists of fact-finders for use by the bargaining parties. He views his agency primarily as a conciliation mechanism.

The Process

As is obvious from the brief structural descriptions above, we are dealing with four very different states who have chosen very different structural approaches for administering what is essentially the same process: the conduct of bargaining relationships between public employers and public employees. And although the examination of these states was limited to brief interviews and thus is fairly superficial, it appears at this point that each state's particular structure is functioning satisfactorily, particularly when one considers the state of the art and the degree of bargaining maturity in each state. It is clear from our look at these four states that the administration of K-12 teacher bargaining relationships is an evolving phenomenon in which the participants must be alert enough to anticipate and accommodate change, especially that which occurs at the local level.

The remainder of this discussion will be devoted to describing and contrasting the ways in which these four states implement, administer and monitor the bargaining process. In general, the focus will be on the process related to the development and maintenance of bargaining relationships between 'teacher organizations and school boards and the state role in each of the major facets:

 Representation—the formalization of a bargaining relationship between teachers in a decided bargaining unit and a school board.

Impasse resolution—the steps that are followed in resolving a dispute that arises at the bargaining table over terms and conditions of employment.

3. Unfair practice charges-the mechanisms for bringing, hearing, issuing rulings and applying remedies for activities that may be illegal under state bargaining laws. A significant number of states route unfair practice charges through their court systems-a mechanism not investigated for this report. However, some states. assign this function to state-level agencies and/or boards and the unfair practice area is discussed in this context.

Getting Ready to Bargain

When teachers in an employee organization decide that they wish to bargain with their school board≤on their "salaries, wages and terms and conditions of employment," under most state laws they must first convince the school board that they are ready to begin the process—that they have the support of a majority of the teachers (and perhaps other school personnel) and that the group of employees who wish to bargain as a single unit is composed of those who. have a community of interestsimilar positions, similar salary scales and similar concerns. If the evidence supplied by the teacher organization is satisfactory to the school board, and if. it fulfills the intent, if not the letter, of the law, rules and regulations imposed by the state, the school board must almost always recognize the organization as an exclusive representative, thereby agreeing to negotiate a contract.

It is quite possible, in many of the states with bargaining laws, for this simple and often uncomplicated process to occur without state involvement or intervention. Under New York law, local jurisdictions including school boards may organize and bargain under state law or under a !local ordinance that is "substantially equivalent" to the New York law. If the recognition process is smooth and trouble-free, the PERB is not necessarily involved. State involvement in an undisputed recognition procedure is not required in Minnesota either. (the law is silent), but in practice, employee organizations and school districts have consistently requested state oversight and certification from the Bureau of Mediation Services. In California the law requires that the public employment relations board track and record the recognition process, even in the absence of a dispute. And in Kansas where, again, undisputed recognition may occur without state-level involvement, it most often 'doesn't because employee organizations and school boards lack a complete understanding of the legal requirements for recognition, and require state-level assistance to complete the process.

In all four of the states, however, the appropriate staté agency is requested by the parties to provide assistance when there is a dispute over the establishment of a bargaining relationship between teachers and school boards: These disputes may revolve around a school board's doubt that the teacher organization has enough support to warrant the bargaining relationship; there may be either an undefined unif · (insufficient identification of the employees who will be represented in the bargaining relationship or a lack of agreement between the parties on who will be included in the unit) or another employee organization may indicate that it too wishes to represent the same group of employees. Procedures are outlined in the law (in all of the four states examined) for handling these kinds of problems and the legal steps toward resolution are much the same. But three of the states employ an informal-and often effectivetechnique before resorting to a statutory dispute resolution procedure. New York, California and Kansas all, after verifying the bargaining parties' petition for assistance and complying with legal requirements for notification of the involved parties, will bring the disputing parties together in an informal setting and attempt to (1) define the problems and issues more clearly, (2) clarify the parties' understanding of the laws, rules, board, agency or court decisions that are relevant to the dispute, and (3) mediate the dispute on the spot—thus allowing the parties an opportunity to come to their own agreement on the issues without having state-level decisions imposed on them.

The philosophy behind this informal step is that early, informal and amiable settlement of any dispute in the bargaining process will smooth the way for further negotiations in a congenial or at least less hostile environment. Jerry Powell, Labor Relations Chief in Kansas, explained the rationale this way: "We don't like to make winners and losers, and that's what we do when we hold a hearing and issue a decision."

However, if the conciliatory process is not effective, hearings are held. While the representation dispute may center on any one of a number of items, most often, such disputes hinge on the selection of the personnel to be included in the bargaining unit. Until these employees are clearly identified, an election to determine exclusive representation by one organization or another, or a choice by those voting for "no representation," cannot be held.

Representation hearings are conducted much like any state administrative hearing. A hearing officer assigned by the appropriate agency collects by subpoena or some other way the appropriate documentation, hears the arguments of both parties, may subpoena necessary witnesses and issues a decision which usually is accompanied by an order for an election. If the issue is one of unit determination, the decision will specify which employees are appropriate for inclusion in the unit, and which employees may not be included in the unit—thus clearing the way for the election pro-

All of the four states examined delegate the conduct and/or supervision of elections to the state-level agency assigned to deal with representation disputes. In New York and California, this agency is the PERB, in Minnesota it is the Bureau of Mediation Services, and in Kansas, the Labor Relations Section under the Secretary of Human Resources. In cooperation with the parties, these staff people determine whether or not the elections should be on-site or by mail, set a date, identify observers, provide proper notification to the involved parties (and to the public if required by law), and collect and tally the ballots. Upon determining which organization, if any, has been selected by a majority of the voters, the agency provides the winning organization with "certification" as the exclusive representative of the employees in the bargaining unit. This state-level certification is a mandate to the employer to recognize the unit and to begin the bargaining process.

But, because even elections are not immune from complications, the state-level agency may have to involve itself more extensively in the election process. It may be necessary to investigate charges that rules and regulations for the election were violated, or to conduct run-off elections in the absence of a clear majority winner.

Another facet of the representation process is the collection of a service fee, often through payroll deduction, from employees in a bargaining unit who are not members of the organization that represents them at the bargaining table. Many of the states with bargaining laws permit this practice and indeed, one or two require it. The question of whether or not a service fee is to be imposed is very often negotiated at the bargaining table. The amount of the service fee, also known as an agency shop fee or fair share fee, may be equivalent to the regular dues of the members of the employee organization. Or, it may be a proportionate share of the dues that is directly related to the services performed by the employee organization for the nonmember. A few states (Minnesota for example) limit the service fee or fair share fee to 85 percent of member dues. As noted above, in a number of states the amount of the fee may be negotiated, but in addition, some of the state bargaining laws provide that the question of the service fee may be submitted to the bargaining unit members in an election. Often these elections are conducted and/or supervised by the state level agency that is involved in the representation process.

In some of the states where imposition of a service fee is permitted, the bargaining law anticipates that individual employees may object to the payment of such fees. Some state laws permit individual employees to challenge the amount of a service fee if they believe that they are paying more than the value of the services the organization is providing them. In two of the states visited, New York and Minnesota, the public employment relations board receives these challenges and issues rulings on them, which may include an order that the employee be refunded an identified portion of the service fee. Vatalaro in New York, which calls its service fee an agency shop fee, and Obermeyer, who deals with Minnesota's fair share fee in the Bureau of Mediation Services, noted that such challenges are occurring more frequently than they have in the past.

At the Bargaining Table

Once the details of the representation process have been ironed out, the employer and the employee organization are in a position to begin bargaining. While some states set specific deadlines before which the bargaining process must begin, others are not so specific. They may require that bargaining be completed "in time for the budget-making process," or they may not address the issue at all. Whatever the case, sooner or later the parties meet at the bargaining table to negotiate the salaries, wages and other terms and conditions of employment of the members of the bargaining unit. The bargaining is actually conducted by representatives of both parties, who are sometimes, but not always, members of the employee organization or of the school board. School boards in particular tend to employ attorneys or professional negotiators, or on occasion even to asssign the school superintendent to the job. Employee organizations may get help from state association offices.

Most of the time, the bargaining process, while it may not be as smooth as silk, is completed without resorting to extensive impasse procedures. But quite obviously there are times when final agreement cannot be reached without some kind of assistance, and all of the state laws that grant bargaining rights to teachers and/or public employees provide to the parties a mechanism for resolving bargaining disputes.

Impasse Resolution

The industrial bargaining model has provided the public sector with three fairly standard steps for impasse resolution: mediation, fact-finding and arbitration. However, not all state laws provide for all of these three steps. Mediation is universally recommended. Fact-finding is sometimes skipped. And most of the state laws stop short of requiring binding arbitration. In addition, many of the states permit the parties to develop their own impasse procedures within the constraints of the law.

Mediation, sometimes referred to as conciliation, is a facilitating process. When one or both of the bargaining parties decides that agreement on certain issues cannot be reached, or when a statutory time limit has expired, the state labor relations board or agency is contacted and asked to supply a mediator. In some states the bargaining parties are not required to go through state channels for impasse resolution but since this report is devoted to state involvement in teacher bargaining, we will not explore that alternative here.

State boards/agencies may supply mediators in a number of ways: from regular staff, from a list of ad hoc or per diem mediators, or the request may be forwarded to an organization like the American Arbitration Association or the Federal Mediation or Conciliation Service. Kansas, for example, requests the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service to supply neutrals to the parties while California and Minnesota assign staff mediators.

New York maintains a panel of ad hoc mediators who work as subcontractors on a case-by-case basis.

The procedures a mediator uses to help the parties reach an agreement are not regulated in the state bargaining laws. Therefore, as long as the techniques employed are ethical and not in violation of some other section of state law, the mediator is free to use his or her own discretion in handling the dispute. In all of the states examined we learned that the mediator's technique is almost always tailored to fit individual situations and needs. He/she may find it necessary to be aggressive in one case or passive in another. It may be advisable for the. mediator to be able to inform the parties about the law or to help them understand legal precedent. Always, the mediator should be able to convince the parties that he/she understands their positions and that his/her only interest is in helping the two parties move their opposing positions toward compromise and, ultimately, a signed contract or agreement. All of those interviewed in the four states visited said that the settlement rate for cases referred to mediation was very good.

But what happens when mediation fails? A majority of the states with bargaining laws provide for the fact-finding process, but some state laws eliminate this step and move directly to a form of voluntary or mandatory arbitration. The bargaining laws in New York, California, and Kansas provide for fact-finding while Minnesota law ignores it.

New York, California and Kansas do not supply staff fact finders. When the appropriate agency in these states receives a request for fact-finding assistance, the agency supplies the parties with a list of suitable fact finders and it is the job of the parties in most states to select a single fact-finder or a panel of fact finders from this list. But procedures vary a little from state to state. Kansas, for example, permits the parties to select either one factfinder or a panel of three. California requires the parties to select a threemember panel. In New York, the parties indicate their preferences for specific fact-finders on a list supplied by the PERB, but appointment of factfinders is made by PERB.

Like mediators, fact-finders, once assigned to a case, proceed independently and on their own initiative. They are most often granted specific powers that enable them to secure necessary documents and statistical data and to conduct administrative hearings. After the documents and data are collected and the hearing has been held; with both parties presenting their cases, the fact-finder(s) is in a position to analyze the issues and make recommendations for settlement.

An essential slice of information in many fact-finding processes is the last-best-offer of each party on the issues that are in dispute: California and New York require only that the parties submit a list of the issues to be resolved, while Kansas and Minnesota require a formal last-best-offer from each party. Whatever the requirement, it is fairly safe to assume that when the data has been collected and the case has been heard, the fact finder is certain to know the parties' position on each issue. The place of each party's last-best-offer in the fact-finder's deliberations and recommendations is sometimes determined by state law. In some states the fact-finder may not be required to incorporate any position of either party into his/her recommendations. In others, he/she may be required to choose the entire lastbest-offer of one party. Or state law may require that the fact-finder choose such last-best-offers on an issue-by-issue basis or to base recommendations on some other combination of factors. Some state laws contain provisions outlining the criteria to be applied in the development of factfinding recommendations. These include a concern for the "best interests" of both parties and, certainly, in the process of coming to a decision, the fact-finder must analyze all of the data collected, and be aware of legal constraints that may affect the recommendations.

Fact finding recommendations are always advisory' and the parties are free to accept or reject them. If the recommendations are accepted, the dispute is over, of course. But if they are not accepted, one or more of several solutions, or non-solutions, are provided for, or not provided for, in state bargaining laws.

Most of the state laws skirt the issue of requiring the parties to submit to an arbitration procedure, although a significant number of them permit the parties to agree to arbitration. In some of the states that permit voluntary arbitration, (Pennsylvania and Rhode Island, for example) such arbitration must be restricted to mandatory subjects of negotiation or to non-fund items. At a certain point in the impasse time line, Connecticut requires the parties to submit to arbitration. Iowa imposes arbitration at the 'request of either party and Wisconsin uses a process that combines arbitration with mediation. Delaware flatly prohibits the use of arbitration in an

None of the four states visited requires arbitration. Kansas law is silent on the issue of arbitration. Instead, when fact-finding recommendations are rejected by either party in Kansas the public employer, after complying with certain procedures, is free to issue a unilateral contract "in the best interest of the employees and of the public." Teachers dissatisfied with the unilateral contract may, under 1980 amendments to the Kansas law, resign without monetary penalties. In California, if one or both of the parties rejects factfinding recommendations, they are free to return to the bargaining table and continue negotiating, but that is as far as the statute goes.

An alternative to arbitration might be a strike in California, but statutory provisions regarding strikes are not clear and have been interpreted on the one hand to permit strikes and on the other to prohibit them. The PERB in California is divided on the issue and court decisions have been inconclusive; the issue revolves about whether or not strikes can be ruled an uniair practice.

New York law permits the parties to agree to arbitration of a contract dispute but such arbitration is restricted to mandatory items of negotiation.

The arbitrator, like the fact-finder, operates independently in the case, reviewing the record of the fact-finder (or, in Minnesota's case, collecting information much like a fact-finder does) and coming to a final decision on the issues in dispute.

Strikes

New York law is clear on strikesthey are prohibited and some penalties are mandatory. When a strike is held, the employer must withhold two days pay for each day an employee is on strike. PERB must order the suspension of the dues and agency shop fee checkoff (payroll deduction) privilege of the union for a specific of indefinite period of time. However, these and other penalties may be appealed to the courts.

Minnesota law (which does not provide for fact-finding) does provide for both voluntary arbitration and strikes. In 1980, the legislature amended the public employee law to make it exceedingly specific on those actions. In that state, the point at which impasse may be declared is not when the parties request a mediator, but after mediation has failed or after a specific deadline has passed. At this point the Bureau of Mediation Services requests the parties to file their final positions for use by an arbitrator. If they comply, the process continues through to a final and binding deci- " sion, unless, of course, the parties resolve the dispute on their own during the arbitration process. But, under the Minnesota law, the parties do have an option at this point. They may refuse to file a final offer or reject the use of arbitration and, if a variety of other conditions are present and/or complied with, the employee organization may call a legal strike, after giving a tenday notice to the employer and the ^{*}Nevada law provides for "binding factfinding," which is really arbitration by a less inflammatory name.

Bureau of Mediation Services. If the strike is perceived as a threat to the public well-being, the court may issue an injunction. Mandatory strike penalties include loss of pay for strike days, loss of organizational standing as exclusive representative and loss of dues checkoff privileges. But, as in New York, these penalties are appealable to the courts.

After the Strike?

What happens after a strike is conducted? This is an area that was not examined for this project. We know that illegal strikes may be enjoined. and that penalties may be applied, but we know very little about the process that is followed in order to bring the dispute to a final resolution and to bring the parties back together in a contractual working relationship. Oregon and Wisconsin, for example, both states that permit certain kinds of strikes, require that an illegal and enjoined strike be followed by binding arbitration of the dispute, and we note from our investigation of Kansas that the Labor Relations Section of the Department of Human Resources may be called in to provide additional mediation services during or after a strike. We are left with a great number of unanswered questions. Do the parties resume bargaining? Are they provided with additional state assistance? How long does it take them to arrive at a signed contract? What is the tone of employer employee relations after a strike? Does a strike during one round of contract negotiations affect the conduct of subsequent contract negotiations? What are the long term effects of strikes on public policy making?

Unfair Practice Charges

While a majority of the states with teacher bargaining laws have set up state-level machinery to handle much of the bargaining process a few of them have left the processing of unfair charges to state and local courts. This is true in Minnesota and until 1980 it was true in Kansas. In New York responsibility for processing unfair practice charges is delegated to the PERB; this is the case in California as well. Both of these states have set up special divisions in their agencies to handle this aspect of the bargaining process. In New York, this is the employment practices and representation unit of the PERB and in California, the chief administrative law judge in the PERB carries the responsibility. The process for both states is essentially the same. Charges are filed by the employee organization, the employer or the individual employee. They are reviewed for timeliness and format and evaluated for validity. A hearing officer is assigned and, in both states, the parties are brought together for an informal prehearing conference at which the hearing officer employs mediation techniques in an effort to resolve the case on the spot and get the charge withdrawn. If this technique is not successful the case is submitted to a formal hearing, where evidence and testimony are provided by both parties. After the hearing, the hearing officer issues a decision that either (1) finds that no unfair practice has been committed or (2) verifies all or part of the unfair practice charge and orders appropriate remedies. In both states the hearing officer decisions may be appealed to the PERB board and finally to the courts.

It is in the unfair practice arena that scope of bargaining is most often addressed; Charges are filed under the umbrella of "failure to bargain in good faith." Therefore, the decisions that are issued here are responsible in part for the expansion or limitation or refinement of each state's scope of bargaining.

Staffing for State-Level Boards/Agencies

Staffing requirements in the four states examined vary greatly. And because of the nature of the state structures, and differences in responsibilities and case loads, comparisons are impractical. At first glance, it appears that California has the most state-level personnel involved in the administration of bargaining. The New York PERB has a smaller regular, staff than California, but if one considers, for example, that the New York agency uses ad hoc mediators, not regular staff members, while the Bureau of Mediation Services in California uses staff mediators it is not so easy to decide which state uses more personnel, and perhaps it is not important.

Both California and New York rely significantly on personnel with law degrees (attorneys) to staff their agencies. These people are hired primarily for their hearing skills: In New York attorneys are used in both the representation and unfair practice hearings; and in California the major focus of most of the attorneys is in the unfair practice area with non-attorneys conducting the bulk of the representation hearings. In addition, in both states attorneys serve as advisors to, and representatives of, the board members. There is less emphasis on the use of attorneys in Minnesota and Kansas. There are no staff attorneys in the Kansas Labor Relations Section, and only one in the Minnesota Bureau of Mediation Services. Perhaps the inclusion of a significant number of attorneys on an agency's staff reflects the application of state personnel policies - or budgeting practices since attorneys tend to be expensive - or it might be a simple application of the board or agency's view of the skills and competency required to administer the bargaining process. Agency or department heads in both Minnesota and Kansas, where the legal background of certain personnel does not appear to be as important, indicated that education qualifications for employment were less important to them than demonstrated skills, competency, and experience. Whatever the case, all of the agencies examined in the four states appeared to be functioning efficiently and effectively.

Procedures may be Bargained

An "x" in this column means that the parties negotiating a contract may include their own procedures for impasse resolution in their agreement. If they choose not to do so, the procedures outlined in the law must be followed. Such provisions may cover mediation, fact-finding and arbitration, but not necessarily all of them.

Mediation, Fact-Finding, Arbitration

Mediation involves an effort by a third party or parties to facilitate the settlement of a dispute by the parties themselves. Fact-finding involves the collection and review of all relevant facts in a dispute by a third party or parties in order to submit independent recommendations for settlement. Recommendations are always advisory. However, Nevada's law calls for "binding factfinding" - which should be named. more aptly, arbitration. Arbitration is the imposition of a final decision on the dispute by a third party or parties. This decision is made after a careful review of the case and of the procedures employed prior to submission of the dispute to arbitration. The final decision may be made in different ways that are often outlined in the state laws. The arbitrator(s) may select the last best offer of one of the parties as the final decision. He/she may pick and choose last-bestoffer items from both parties' final proposals to make up the final package. Or he/she may make an independent decision on settlement.

"Advisory" arbitration decisions are misnamed — the nature of arbitration is binding. Voluntary binding arbitration takes place by agreement of both parties. Restricted arbitration means that specific parts of an arbitration decision may not be binding, i.e., cost items. Compulsory binding arbitration may be imposed on the parties by law or by agency decision, and is used most often in the public arena for police and fire personnel, who are prohibited from striking.

Strikes are Always Restricted, as Follows:

Alaska's public Employment Relations Act, which covers postsecondary personnel and K-12 personnel that are employed in state institutions or regional educational attendance areas provides that these employees may strike for limited periods of time determined by the interests of the health, safety or welfare of the public. Strikes may be enjoined if such public interest is threatened. Strikes may occur only after mediation has been attempted and only if a major- ity of the employees in a unit vote to do so. If the conditions of impasse continue after a strike has been enjoined, the matter must be submitted to compulsory arbitration. Employees of local school boards bargain under a separate law that is silent on the right to strike.

Hawaii's Public Employee Law, which covers both K-12 and postsecondary personnel, grants strike rights to employees who are in a recognized certified unit that is not required to employ binding arbitration in lieu of a strike (police and fire, for example). Such strikes may occur after the dispute resolution processes have been exhausted, after proceedings for prevention of unfair practices have been exhausted, 60 days after the publication of fact-finding recommendations, and after submitting a 10-day notice of intent to strike. Illegal strikes may be enjoined.

Minnesota's Public Employment Labor Relations Act, which covers both K-12 and postsecondary personnel, grants strike rights to personnel who are other than confidential, essential, managerial and supervisory, principals and assistant principals, under certain circumstances. The collective bargaining agreement must have expired, or impasse must have been declared, mediation must have been conducted over at least 45 days, notice of intent to strike must have been served 10 days in advance; a request for binding arbitration must have been rejected, or the employer must have committed an unfair practice.

Montana's Public Employee Law is silent on the right to strike, and personnel have been granted the right to strike by 1974 supreme court decision.

Oregon's Public Employee Law, which covers both K-12 and postsecondary personnel, grants strike rights to employees who are in a recognized certified unit that is not required to employ binding arbitration in lieu of a strike. Such strikes may occur after the dispute resolution process has been exhausted, after proceedings for prevention of unfair practices have been exhausted, 30 days after fact-finding recommendations have been made public. Strikes that are determined to create a "clear and present danger to the health, safety or welfare of the public" may be enjoined, after which the dispute must be submitted to binding arbitration within 10 days.

Pennsylvania's Public Employee Labor Relations Act, which covers both K-12 and postsecondary personnel, grants strike rights to employees after mediation procedures he can exhausted. Strikes that are to create "a clear and present danger or threat to the health, safety or welfare of the public" may be enjoined. Unfair practice charges are not a defense to a prohibited strike.

Vermont's Labor Relations Act for Teachers is obscure in its treatment of strike rights, but has been interpreted as permissive. The act prohibits injunctions unless "the action poses a clear and present danger to a sound program of school education which in the light of all relevant circumstances it is in the best public interest to prevent."

Wisconsin's Municipal Employment Relations Act, which covers K-12 and community college personnel, grants strike rights to employees other than police and fire who are members of a recognized certified unit that has approved the strike. Strikes may occur after exhaustion of mediation-arbitration procedures, after the arbitrator has declared his intent to impose binding arbitration, after both parties have withdrawn their final offers, and after 10 days notice. Strikes may be enjoined.

Glossary

Agency Shop:

This term is used when employees who are not members of an employee organization, but who are represented by it during the bargaining process and in the administration of a bargained agreement, are required to pay a service fee to the organization.

Arbitration:

A procedure whereby parties unable to agree on a solution to a problem (i.e., at impasse in a contract negotiation or a grievance procedure) will be bound by the decision of a third party.

Bargaining Unit:

A group of employees organized as a single unit and having the right to bargain, through their designated representative(s), with the employer.

Certificated/

Certified Employee:

As the term applies to education: a teacher, supervisor, principal or other administrator who must hold a state certificate in order to be employed in the profession.

Certification:

As the term applies in the recognition process: designation, by an authorized person or agency, of the employee organization representing a bargaining unit as an "exclusive representative" for bargaining purposes.

Classified Employee: Fer the purposes of the chart in this book, a classified employee is one who is below the rank of teachers, i.e., food employees, bus drivers, clerks, maintenance personnel, etc. Not to be confused with state-level classified employees; i.e., civil service positions that may be "classified" from bottom to top.

Community of Interest:

As used in defermining an appropriate bargaining unit: similar work, interests, salaries, concerns, etc.

Conciliation

See Mediation.

Contract:

A written agreement on terms and conditions of employment arrived at through the bargaining process. Also Memorandum of Agreement, Memorandum of Understanding.

Court Review

The means through which a court of appropriate jurisdiction may consider and rule upon actions or findings of a labor relations board or other involved agency or individual.

Decertification:

The withdrawal of authorization as an exclusive representative from an employee organization. May occur when another employee organization successfully challenges the qualifications of the first organization, or as a penalty for violation of law, rule or regulation.

Dues Checkoff:

Deduction of employee organization dues from member's paychecks for remission to the organization treasury. Some state laws do not permit this practice; others do. When permitted, the dues deduction procedure often is negotiated as part of the contract between employer and employee bargaining unit.

Employee ← Organization:

A group of similar employees organized for the purpose of bargaining their salaries, wages and terms and conditions of employment with their employer. Most teacher organizations are affiliated with the National Education Association or the American Federation of Teachers. Often used interchangeably with union in the area of labor relations.

Exclusive Representation:

An employee organization has exclusive representation as when it is recognized by the employer, for bargaining purposes, as the sole representative of the kinds of employees who are members of the bargaining unit.

Fact-Finding:

The process of gathering and analyzing accurate facts, information and testimony to be used as a basis for recommendations for the resolution of a bargaining impasse or grievance charge.

Fair Share Fee:

An amount proportionate to members' dues in an employee organization that is paid to the organization by non-members who are, nevertheless, represented by the organization in a bargaining relationship. Such non-members are a part of the bargaining unit, but not of the employee organization that represents them. A form of service fee, based on the proportion of dues that is directly related to the services the non-member employee receives from the organization. Often negotiated.

Grievance:

An allegation by an employee or by the employee organization that the employer or one of its agents, often in the process of implementing a contract, is guilty of misapplication, misinterpretation or violation of one or more specific provisions of the existent contract.

Impasse:

That stage in negotiations at which two parties are, or appear to be, unable to achieve agreement on the issues still on the bargaining table. There is an apparent lack of agreement among state laws and among state labor relations personnel as to the point at which impasse occurs; when mediation has failed, or when fact-finding has failed.

impasse Resolution

A process aimed at resolving disagreements that occur during the bargaining of a contract. Three steps may be.

but are not necessarily, involved: mediation, factfinding, and arbitration. Also known as interest resolu-

Injunctive Relief:

An order by a court to perform or cease to perform a specific activity.

Interest Resolution:

See Impasse Resolution.

Intervention/ Intervenor:

A challenge to an employee organization's right to be an exclusive representative for a bargaining unit. May be issued by a competing organization or one or more employees. Most state laws limit the times for such intervention to specific points in the establishment of a bargaining relationship, during or after the term of/a contract.

Legislative Body:

A policy-making body that has the authority to levy taxes and/or make appropriations.

Maintenance of Membership:

A requirement that employees who are members of an employee organization that has been certified as an exclusive representative remain members during the term of a bargained contract.

Management Rights:

Certain rights, privileges, responsibilities and authority requisite to the conduct of an enterprise by its management.

Mediation:

That form of impasse resolution (usually implemented first) in which a third party meets with the two parties involved in the dispute, together and/or separately, in order to perform a catalytic function in an effort to help the parties reach an agreement.

Memorandum of Agreement:

See Contract.

Memorandum of Understanding:

See Contract.

Middle Management: For the purposes of the chart in this book, the term . encompasses personnel from supervisors to a level just below top management.

Nonprofessional Employee:

Most often, a lower-level employee whose work is routine, the performance of which is not dependent on specialized education at the postsecondary level or equivalent experience.

Organizational Security:

See Union Security.

Frofessional Employee:

Most often, a higher-level employee whose work is not routine or measurable, the performance of which is dependent on specialized education at the postsecondary level or equivalent experience.

Recognition:

The accomplishment of the status; by the employee organization with the employer, of collective bargaining agent for a unit of defined extent.

Representation Election:

An election held to identify an appropriate employee organization as the exclusive representative of employees in a defined bargaining unit. The employee organization receiving a majority of votes is the winner.

Scope of Bargaining:

Bargainable items—the limits, if any, of the appropriate subject matter for bargaining. If such are not set by law, they are determined by the interaction at the bargaining table. If there is not agreement on the scope of bargaining, decisions may be made by a public employment relations board, other administering agency, individual or by an appropriate court.

'Service Fees:

A sum of money paid to the bargaining unit by nonmember employees who are, nevertheless, represented by the bargaining unit. Some state laws permit these fees; other do not. Service fees may be equal to a unit member's regular dues; they may be a certain percentage of these dues; they may be equal to that portion of membership dues that are used to cover the expense of negotiating and administering a contract. In some states, non-members represented by a negotiating unit who have valid religious objections to the payment of service fees to an organized bargaining unit may be granted an exemption from the requirement; or their service fee may be remitted to an appropriate charity.

Showing of Support/ Interest:

Submission of evidence by an employee organization wishing to represent a bargaining unit that it has adequate support/interest/membership from personnel in the bargaining unit. This may be in the form of signature cards, petition signatures, etc.

Strike:

A concerted work stoppage, usually used as an effort at the time of impasse to accomplish a contract on terms acceptable to the union.

Supervisor:

An individual who, using independent judgment, directs other employees and has a voice in their employment, reward, discipline, dismissal and grievances.

Union:

An employee organization that has as one of its purposes the bargaining of terms and conditions of employment with an employer. In this book, used interchangeably with Employee Organization.

Union Security:

A blanket term for rights, granted to a union by law or agreement, that reinforce its position as exclusive representative. Dues deduction and service fees are forms of union security, as are specified periods of time during which the union's standing as exclusive representative may not be challenged.

Union Shop:

This term applies when an employee is required under the terms of a bargained agreement to become a member of the bargaining unit within a short time after initial employment in order to retain the job. Membership must be maintained during the term of the bargained agreement. In rare cases, union shops are permitted under state law.

Unit Determination:

The process of deciding which employees will be in a proposed bargaining unit. Criteria for determination include community of interest, practicality. In some states, units are specifically defined by law.

Unit Modification:

A change in the composition (kinds of employees) of a bargaining unit.

Education Commission of the States

The Education Commission of the States is a nonprofit organization formed by interstate compact in 1966. Forty-eight states, American Samoa, Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands are now members. Its goal is to further a working relationship among governors, state legislators and educators for the improvement of education. This report is an outcome of one of many commission undertakings at all levels of education. The commission offices are located at Suite 300, 1860 Lincoln Street, Denver, Colorado 80295.
