ABSTRACT

This book is a study of civil cases, filed in court after 1976, involving students in elementary and high schools. The number of cases comes to 1,632, of which 769 are concerned with special education, 290 with disciplinary matters, and 248 with sports. The remaining cases deal with racial and sex discrimination, freedom of religion, establishment of religion, freedom of speech, and other subjects. The study does not include cases involving teachers or college students, ordinary personal injury cases, or criminal and juvenile actions. The catalog forms the bulk of the book, listing cases alphabetically by state. Each case entry is preceded by one or more code numbers indicating the type of issue (organized under the topics mentioned above into 54 sub-categories). The case entries provide information about the name and procedural history of each case, the issues, and the plaintiffs' attorneys. Other sections of the catalog explain the procedures used to find the cases and attempt to estimate the completeness of the compilation. Additional statistical information provided in the study includes the incidence of cases of each type in each state, the number of cases filed by students or by schools, the types of attorneys, the number of filings by year, and the outcomes of the cases. ## 1. INTRODUCTION

This book is a study of civil cases, filed in court after 1976, involving students in elementary and high schools. The catalog of such cases comes to 1,632, of which 769 are concerned with special education, 290 with disciplinary matters, and 248 with sports. The remaining cases deal with racial and sex discrimination, freedom of religion, establishment of religion, freedom of speech, and many other subjects. The study does not include cases involving teachers or college students, ordinary personal injury cases, or criminal and juvenile actions. The catalog forms the bulk of the book, listing cases alphabetically by state; each case entry is preceded by one or more code numbers indicating the type of issue.

The compilation was undertaken for two reasons. The first was to discover how frequently the various issues concerning students are being litigated. Most government officials and attorneys in the education field have limited knowledge about the frequency and scope of such litigation in their states. Many disputes are local, and because they only involve local school boards, local courts, and local attorneys, they are little known outside the particular town or school district.

The second reason for gathering the cases was one important to the National Center for State Courts as an organization devoted to improving court structure and operation. We are studying attorneys' selection of courts--how often they choose state courts as opposed to federal courts, why they choose one forum or the other, and what this tells us about areas for improvement. This topic will be explored more fully in a second report, to be issued later. The study of forum choice, it is important to note, influences the scope of the catalog: we chose topics in which federal law predominates (by excluding teacher cases and personal injury cases), and we did not include cases filed before 1977, even though still pending, because we desired a sample of cases that could be compared statistically when studying forum choice.

Although some cases in the catalog are available from reported decisions and from other published sources, most were found by telephoning thousands of attorneys around the country. As best we can estimate, we have obtained 60 to 70 percent of the cases falling within the scope of the study; the percentage is higher for 1979 and 1980 cases and lower for 1977 and 1978 cases. Only several 1981 cases are included since the search was conducted over seven months ending in early June. The catalog is most nearly complete in the special education area; we found approximately 80 percent of these cases. The catalog is reasonably complete in sports, religion, and civil rights cases--probably two-thirds complete. The most difficult cases to locate were those dealing with discipline and school assignment, for only lawyers in the immediate vicinity generally know about these cases. Here the catalog may be substantially less than half complete.

The book is organized as follows: Section 2 defines the types of cases in the catalog. The third section describes the organization and content of a case entry, explaining the types of information given about each case in the catalog. The fourth describes the issues found in the cases, arranging them according to an index system that can be used to locate specific types of cases in the catalog. It also contains a table giving the incidence of cases of each type in each state. The fifth section gives additional statistical information: the number of cases filed by students or by schools, the types of attorneys, the number of filings by year, and the outcomes of the cases. The sixth section explains the procedures used to find the cases--e.g., the published sources of information and the types of people contacted--and the seventh section attempts to estimate the completeness of the compilation. Finally, the bulk of the book is the catalog of the 1,632 cases.

2. DESCRIPTION OF CASES IN THE CATALOG

The catalog contains student litigation filed in court after 1976. A more exact definition emerges from the following list of qualifications for inclusion.

1. Court Cases. Only if a complaint was filed in a state or federal court is a case included. Cases before administrative agencies are excluded.
2. Cases Filed After 1976. The cases must have been filed no earlier than January 1977; even cases filed in late December 1976 are not included. A few attorneys contacted were not sure whether their cases were filed in 1977 or earlier, and we asked for their best estimate. The date of filing is the date filed in the original trial court; appeals from trial court decisions are not included unless the original trial court filing was after 1976. The few cases filed originally in appellate courts are included if filed after 1976.
3. Cases with Minimum Information. Cases are not included unless we obtained the case name, the general issue, and a filing date after 1976. A few cases are included with incomplete information about the procedural history or the attorneys.
4. Civil Cases Only. The catalog is limited to civil cases. It does not contain criminal, juvenile delinquency, status offense, or dependency cases, even though such cases occasionally contain education issues in the disposition phase. The catalog, therefore, is largely limited to cases in the general jurisdiction trial courts, although cases in juvenile, family, or other limited jurisdiction courts are included if they otherwise meet the criteria set forth here.
5. School Cases. The catalog contains only cases involving elementary and high school students. It does not include those involving preschool students, university or college students, trade school students, or incarcerated juveniles; nor does it include cases involving institutionalized children when the major issues concern quality of treatment rather than education.

6. Cases Involving Students. The catalog does not include cases involving teachers, school board operations, construction contracts, or a host of other topics that do not directly involve students. A student (or a parent or guardian) is a plaintiff or defendant in almost all cases listed, although teachers and others are the parties in a few cases where the issue is closely connected to student matters, such as curriculum content.

7. No Ordinary Personal Injury Cases. We excluded ordinary personal injury cases filed by students (e.g., for injuries incurred during sports). We included, however, tort suits and other damage actions that involve matters of student rights, such as actions for damages arising from corporal punishment.

For further information about the types of cases in the catalog the reader should consult Section 4 (page 5), which gives a narrative description of issue categories under which cases may be located in the catalog.

3. DESCRIPTION OF ENTRIES IN THE CATALOG

The entries in the catalog provide concise information about the name and procedural history of each case, the issues, and the plaintiffs' attorneys. The attorneys (or in a few cases, the reported decisions) can be consulted for more comprehensive information. The following items describe the contents in each case entry.

1. Name of Case. The short form is used, giving only the first party named on each side and only the last name of individuals. The spelling may be incorrect in a few cases, and the exact defendant is occasionally uncertain, since the attorneys contacted sometimes relied on memory for the case names. When names changed as a case progressed, we used the latest name available. Cases listed in the catalog are styled in the manner requested by the plaintiffs' attorneys. A few attorneys requested "Doe" plaintiffs or deletion of last names, even though the full names are on record. When the plaintiff is designated by the full first name and the initial of the last name, the case is placed alphabetically in the catalog according to the initial of the last name (so it can be located also by the full last name). The same rule applies when the plaintiff is designated only by initials of first and last names. Cases styled "In re" or "In the matter of" are placed alphabetically according to the name of the child.

2. Court in Which Filed. Immediately after the case name is the name of the court in which the case was originally filed, almost always a general jurisdiction trial court. When two or more separate cases were filed concerning the same or similar incidents, they are shown separately if treated as separate filings by the parties and not consolidated soon after the filings. Cases removed from a state to a federal court and certified questions from a federal to a state court are not counted as separate cases. The name of the court is abbreviated; for example, a United States District Court is "U.S. Dist. Ct." The court location is usually given--the district for federal courts (e.g., "W. D." for the Western District) or the county for state courts.

3. Date of Filing. The next entry is the year, with, when available, the month of filing. As previously indicated, the catalog includes only cases originally filed in 1977 or later. Attorneys were occasionally uncertain about the year of filing, especially for cases filed before 1980, and they were asked to give their best guess. Independent information about the filing dates, however, was obtained for most cases from reports or from docket numbers. In a few rare cases, the attorney would not hazard a guess, but believed the case was filed after 1976; a filing date is not given for these cases.

4. Whether a Class Action. The phrase "class action" is placed after the filing date whenever the case was filed as a class action, whether or not later certified as such. (In most instances the class was never certified, generally because the certification question was still pending or because the case was settled before the question was decided.)

5. Major Events in the Case. The next entries give the procedural history after filing. We have included only decisions, filings of appeals, and other events of major significance. We have not included discovery, settlement discussions, or a host of other occurrences in normal litigation. Preliminary injunctions and temporary restraining orders are shown when there is no other court disposition in the case. The decision, if any, by the trial court (and appellate court) is stated as follows: "Decision Dec. 1980, D"--giving the year and month of the decision and the party for whom the court ruled. The notation "P" means that the plaintiff won, "D" that the defendant won, and "M" that the outcome was mixed. We usually used the plaintiff's judgment about who won the case. It must be recognized, of course, that this is not an unbiased opinion; so we often used independent information from written reports. Still, there is often uncertainty about which side really won when the court ruled for the plaintiff on some issues and for the defendant on others.

Some information about procedural history is not up to date. We telephoned attorneys from November 1980 to June 1981, and we do not have current information about many cases located early in this period. When no information is given about procedure other than the filing date, the case was almost always still pending when we talked to the attorney. For a very few cases, we have no information about events after filing.

A case is shown as "settled" whenever the attorney considers it settled, even though there has been neither a formal settlement filed with the court nor a formal dismissal of the action. Settled cases include consent judgments. A case "withdrawn" is one abandoned by the plaintiff without a settlement. A case is "moot" when the underlying reason for the cause of action no longer exists (typically, because the child has left the school). We have made no attempt to determine who actually won the settled, withdrawn, or moot cases, because that would involve quite subjective judgments by the attorneys contacted.

The appellate history, if any, includes the date of the appellate court filing, date of the decision, and the outcome (P, D, or M). Citations to trial or appellate decisions are included. Published opinions are cited to the West Reporter. When there is no such citation, other references are used when available, especially the Education for the Handicapped Law Report (EHLR), the Education Law Bulletin (ELB), and the Clearinghouse Review (CHR). See the list on page 29 for more information about these references.

6. The Issue. The next item is a short statement of the issue or issues. No attempt was made to describe the complex legal questions presented by many of the cases. Although the description was usually obtained from the plaintiff's attorney by telephone, every effort has been made to state the issue in an unbiased manner. We also used descriptions of the issues given in published opinions or other sources, especially those listed on page 29. The issues outlined do not include those collateral to a student's dispute, such as attorney's fees. Although many procedural issues are given in the issue statements, more may have been involved, for attorneys often stressed only the substantive issues when describing their cases. The issues in special education cases are prefaced by the abbreviation "Sp. Ed."

The issues are coded according to ~~issue categories explained in~~ Section 4, and the codes are placed in brackets at the beginning of each entry. One can, therefore, locate cases dealing with a particular issue by first looking at Table 2 (pages 8 to 10) to find the states where the issue occurs and then quickly glancing down the lefthand side of each entry in the catalog for the issue code in those states.

7. Plaintiff's Attorney. The last entry is the name, address, and telephone number of the plaintiff's attorney. We give the plaintiff's attorney rather than the defense attorney because in studying reasons for forum selection we necessarily obtained information from the lawyers who had filed the cases. Only one plaintiff's attorney is named in each case, even though many cases have several. We tried to locate the lead attorney (or one of several lead attorneys) for the plaintiff. Information about the plaintiff's attorney is not given in a few cases, either because they were filed by non-lawyer parents (pro se cases) or because we were not able to determine who the attorney was. Several defense attorneys asked us to include defense attorneys also; unfortunately, this process had to be abandoned after an initial attempt, because gathering and checking the name, address, and phone number of each defense attorney proved too time consuming.

4. DESCRIPTION OF ISSUES IN THE CATALOG

The cases in the catalog have been coded according to the issues as listed in Table 1, page 7. This list of 54 issue categories was developed to analyze the types of cases being litigated, and to aid readers in locating cases with specific types of issues. Here we shall describe in more detail than in Table 1 the content of the issue categories. The purpose is solely to describe the kinds of cases in the various categories; it is not intended to be a legal analysis of the issues. In fact, there are only a few references to specific statutes or court decisions.

Handicap Cases

These cases concern special education for handicapped children, usually based on P.L. 94-142, the Education for All Handicapped Children Act of 1975 (20 U.S.C. 1401 et seq.). Also, several states have local statutes comparable to P.L. 94-142; notably Massachusetts, whose law preceded P.L. 94-142 and is used in that state more often than the federal law. In general, attorneys in handicap cases have a choice of suing under either the federal or the state statutes in the states that have strong education laws for the handicapped.

H1. Placement Outside Public Schools [352 cases]. Here the parents of handicapped children typically seek placement in private day school or residential school, contending that the regular public schools cannot provide adequate special education. A few cases in this category are disputes about what kind of private placement is more appropriate; and a few more are requests for public institutional placement or requests by parents for home tutorial services. Several are also damage actions for the school's failure to provide outside placement in the past. Parents often request reimbursement for placement which the parents have made without the approval of the school.

The school system's defense is typically that it can provide the needed services for the child within the public schools, often in special classrooms. Several cases, however, are contests between a parent and the school over whether the school should pay for residential costs, as opposed to educational costs; and in some the question is whether the child is sufficiently educable so that education should be provided at all.

Although this category contains most of the cases involving special education outside the public school, cases in Category H7 frequently involve non-public school settings, as do some cases in Categories H3 and H9.

H2. Least Restrictive Alternative [66 cases]. Here the parents request mainstreaming or other less restrictive placement for the child, typically seeking a community setting for mentally retarded children, placement in regular classrooms as opposed to special education classes, or placement in the local public school rather than a special education facility. It is interesting to note that there are six or seven times as many cases where parents desire education outside the public schools as cases seeking a less restrictive alternative within the public schools.

H3. Placement (other) [27 cases]. This category contains placement issues that do not fall in other handicap categories, such as differences between parents and the school about which neighborhood school is best for the child. This category is also used when it is known that placement is involved, but not whether the parents seek placement in or out of the public school.

H4. Classification [33 cases]. The primary issue in this category is the method or outcome of the classification process for handicapped children. A major area of dispute concerns the methods used for testing. (Competency testing of handicapped children is coded additionally as A1.)

H5. Eligibility [27 cases]. The issue here is whether handicapped students are outside the special education program because they are too young or too old or because they have received a diploma.

H6. Better Programs [146 cases]. Here parents seek better programs for handicapped children in the public schools, or they seek damages for the school's failure to provide adequate programs in the past. Typically, requests are for psychiatric services, catheterization, or better-trained special education teachers. Damage actions for lack of special education are included in this category unless brought specifically for failure to provide outside placement.

H7. Length of School Year [46 cases]. These cases contest the school's unwillingness to provide special education for more than the regular school year; the parents usually are requesting that private school placement be continued throughout the summer.

H8. Transportation for Handicapped Children [11 cases]. These cases are disputes about what transportation facilities the school district must provide for handicapped children. Cases are placed in this category only if transportation is the major issue; many parents seeking private placement, for example, also request transportation.

H9. Which Government Pays [33 cases]. In most of these cases the local and the state governments disagree about which should pay for residential services for handicapped children. A few cases are disputes between school districts over which should bear the costs of a student's special education.

H0. Other Handicapped [36 cases]. Most cases here are ones in which the only information obtained is that it is a special education case. The category also includes a few issues that do not fall within the above list of issue categories.

P1. Due Process Procedures [112 cases]. These issues concern the procedures required of school districts and the state education agencies in special education cases, other than discipline cases. Common examples are: whether the state education agency can review and change a hearing examiner's decision; who provides the transcript; whether the parents were given sufficient notice of a hearing; whether the school board must provide a due process hearing in a particular situation; and whether administrative remedies must be exhausted before filing in court. It also includes questions about the scope of review by the courts of agency decisions.

P2. Discipline of Handicapped Children [67 cases]. The issue in almost all of these cases is the procedure required to suspend or expel handicapped children--whether P.L. 94-142 procedures must be used instead of the school's regular disciplinary procedures.

Discipline

This section contains pupil discipline cases, except (1) cases where the claim is based on special education laws, which are in Category P2, and (2) cases where the disciplinary action is part of an alleged violation of students' rights enumerated in other issue categories (for example, a student suspended for criticizing teachers would be in Category F1, students' freedom of speech).

D1. Suspension or Expulsion (Nonprocedural Issues) [77 cases]. Here a suspension or expulsion is contested on other than procedural due process grounds. Examples are contentions that there is insufficient evidence of the alleged offense, that the punishment is too harsh for the offense, or that the school should not have a policy of automatic suspension for the offense involved.

D2. Grade Reduction or Removal from Class [13 cases]. In these cases students' grades were reduced or students were dropped from a class because they were absent or tardy too often.

D3. Suspension from Sports [29 cases]. In these cases the school has suspended the student from an extracurricular activity (nearly always sports) for disciplinary reasons. If the suspension is for eligibility (as opposed to disciplinary) reasons, the case falls in the sports regulation section, rather than Category D3.

D4. Corporal Punishment [30 cases]. Most of the cases here are damage suits against schools and teachers for injuries incurred in paddlings. A few are suits to enjoin schools from using corporal punishment or to establish procedures to be used before giving corporal punishment.

D5. Search and Seizure [34 cases]. The student in most of these cases contests a suspension that was based on evidence obtained during a search alleged to be illegal. Many cases are also damage actions. Most searches contested are strip searches or searches conducted on a blanket basis.

D6. Request that Records Be Expunged [7 cases]. Here a remedy sought is to remove a disciplinary action from the student's records.

D7. Other Discipline [9 cases]. This category contains a few discipline cases that do not fall within the specific categories in this section.

D8. Procedure in Suspension or Expulsion [145 cases]. These cases contest the procedures used by the school in suspending or expelling a child. The claims are based on federal due process guarantees or on state statutes and school rules that are stricter than the federal guidelines.

D9. Procedure in Discipline (Other) [25 cases]. These cases concern the proper procedure to be used in disciplinary actions when the discipline is not suspension or expulsion from school.

Regulation of Sports

The cases in this section involve rules regulating extracurricular activity; nearly all involve sports teams, although there are a few cases concerning debating teams, cheerleaders, or the like. The issues concern rules of state high school athletic associations, which are usually voluntary associations of high schools established to regulate interscholastic activities. This section does not include questions about religious school participation in sports leagues (Category R5), sexual discrimination in sports (Category E6), or suspension from sports for disciplinary reasons, including violation of training rules (Category D3). In all, there are 248 cases involving sports (or other extracurricular activities) in the catalog.

The plaintiffs generally allege that the association's rules were applied arbitrarily or that the student was not given a proper hearing before being ruled ineligible. In almost all the cases, speed is important; the lawyer typically asks the court for a temporary restraining order or preliminary injunction to permit the child to play in the game next scheduled. Most of these cases are won or lost within a few days or weeks.

S1. Transfer Rules [54 cases]. Here the athletic association has ruled the student ineligible for a specific period of time (usually 4 to 6 months) after transferring from one school to another. The transfer rules are designed to prevent recruiting.

S2. Other Eligibility Rules [111 cases]. Other common sports eligibility rules provide that the student: must be under a certain age, is only eligible for a certain number of semesters in high school, cannot participate in non-school athletic events, and must participate in a certain number of meets during the school year before entering post-season tournaments.

S3. Other Sports [23 cases]. Most of these cases are disputes over whether a team can enter a state tournament.

S4. Procedural Issues [9 cases]. These cases question the procedure used by the school or, more frequently, by the athletic association, when ruling on student eligibility for sports. The issue is usually whether a hearing is required. Procedural issues are probably involved in many more sports cases than designated in the catalog, because attorneys often mentioned only the substantive issue, leaving out procedural attacks.

Equal Protection

The cases in this section contain equal protection issues in which plaintiffs allege discrimination by reason of race, sex, culture, language, or financial resources. This section does not include equal protection issues arising in special education litigation or cases where an equal protection claim is not the major claim.

E1. School Segregation [53 cases]. These are the typical desegregation suits, claiming that schools, or classes within schools, are segregated according to race or culture.

E2. Racial Discrimination (other) [35 cases]. In these cases the plaintiffs allege racial or cultural discrimination, other than general school segregation. The most common example is discrimination in disciplinary procedures.

E3. Aliens [7 cases]. Here plaintiffs sue for the admission of alien children into public schools without the tuition charge levied on students living out of the district.

E4. Bilingual Education [23 cases]. Here students allege discrimination against non-English-speaking students.

E5. Sex Discrimination (other) [8 cases]. This contains the sex discrimination cases not involving sports.

E6. Sex Discrimination--Sports [28 cases]. In most of these cases, girls desire to play on boys' teams, but in several cases boys sue to play on girls' teams.

E7. School Finance Cases [12 cases]. The plaintiffs here claim that students in less well-financed school systems are denied equal protection and, typically, are not given the adequate education required by the state constitution and statutes.

E8. Other Discrimination [4 cases]. These are miscellaneous discrimination cases; most involve migrants.

Religion Cases

These cases contain issues based on the First Amendment (or on state constitutional or statutory provisions) concerning either freedom or establishment of religion.

R1. Freedom of Religion [22 cases]. This category contains all freedom of religion issues not otherwise categorized in this section.

R2. Establishment of Religion [31 cases]. This contains all establishment of religion issues not in more specific categories. Examples are Bible distribution in schools by religious societies, religious symbolism in ceremonies, and transportation to religious schools.

R3. Prayer Cases [9 cases]. In most of these cases, students contest school prayers or Bible reading, though they occasionally sue for permission to say prayers in school.

R4. Regulation of Religious Schools [10 cases]. These cases involve state and local regulation of religious schools, typically in the areas of curriculum content, teacher certification, competency testing, and reporting of pupil attendance in accordance with compulsory education laws.

R5. Religious Schools in Sports Leagues [5 cases]. Here religious schools sue to enter the public school sports league, claiming violation of religious freedom by excluding them from the league.

B4. Fees and Tuition [17 cases]. Here students contest fees or tuition charged by public schools; the claims are almost always based on state statutes and constitutions calling for free public education. This category does not contain special education cases.

B5. Food Programs [5 cases]. These are typically actions to force schools to provide free meals under federal programs.

B6. Participation in Ceremonies [9 cases]. In almost all of these cases the student is contesting the school's refusal to permit participation in a graduation ceremony.

Academic Matters

A1. Competency Testing [15 cases]. These are disputes about the use of the competency tests that some states require for students to receive promotions or high school diplomas. Plaintiffs often allege discrimination against handicapped children, blacks, or other groups. Another common complaint is insufficient notice of testing, preventing students from properly preparing for the tests.

A2. Education Malpractice [10 cases]. These are tort actions against school authorities for not educating students; they are based on common law, state statutory or constitutional rights to education, or on special education laws. Damage suits under the special education laws, however, are not categorized as education malpractice cases unless considered as such by counsel.

A3. Right to a Diploma (other) [5 cases]. Examples are suits to obtain a diploma after only three years of high school and disputes over the number of credits needed to graduate. This category does not include competency testing issues (category A1) or discipline issues (e.g., categories D2 and D8).

Other Cases

O1. Student Rights (other) [35 cases]. This covers miscellaneous cases that do not fall in the preceding categories. Examples are cases contesting the use of undercover police, suits for inadequate funding of a particular school (as opposed to general school finance cases in category E7), actions contesting required participation in sex education programs, and suits involving gifted and talented programs. No single issue in this category appears more than three times in the catalog.

5. PRELIMINARY ANALYSIS OF THE CASES

A considerable body of data about the cases has been entered in a computer for analysis, and the purpose of this section is to present some preliminary findings. As mentioned earlier, a second report will provide a

Freedom and Privacy

F1. Freedom of Speech and Press [22 cases]. About half of these are freedom-of-speech cases and about half are freedom-of-the-press cases. Most also contest suspension or other discipline, but are placed in this category rather than the section on discipline.

F2. School Literature [13 cases]. Cases in this category are disputes about the literature in school libraries or in course curriculums. Most are suits by parents contesting the removal of publications from the school library.

F3. Dress and Grooming [7 cases]. These cases contest school policies concerning hair length, school attire, and similar matters.

F4. Privacy of and Access to Records [11 cases]. These are the few cases concerning access to student records. The category includes both suits involving the confidentiality of records and suits by students for access to their own records.

F5. Inoculation Issues [5 cases]. These are disputes about inoculation of students, excluding cases where objection to inoculation is on religious grounds (Category R1).

F6. Home Study [7 cases]. This category contains civil cases concerning educating children at home. It does not include handicap cases or truancy prosecutions.

Benefits and Services from Schools

B1. Residency [54 cases]. These are disputes about which public school a student can attend at public expense. The issues are virtually always whether the student is a resident of the school district or whether the residency requirements should be waived. This category does not include the alien cases in Category E3 above. A few involve handicapped children, usually falling in Category H9 as well. The residency cases were particularly hard to find, and may be substantially under-represented in our search.

B2. School Closings [22 cases]. Almost all of these suits contest the procedures used by the school board when closing a school, especially questioning whether the school board allowed sufficient public participation in the decision. This category does not include school closings when the major issue is school desegregation (see Category E1).

B3. Transportation (other) [14 cases]. These are transportation issues not in Categories H8, E1, or R2. A few cases are about transportation to private schools, but cases are coded as category R2 whenever there is a First Amendment issue. Other cases are brought by individual parents requesting better transportation service to the public schools. Cases in this category, generally have only state law issues.

more complete analysis, especially with respect to the attorneys' reasons for choice of forum. (There are 1,632 cases in the catalog and on the computer. But, ten cases were added to Wisconsin after the data was entered into the computer, and ten cases on the computer are not in the catalog for various reasons, usually because we did have the name of the case.)

Types of Cases. Statistics about the types of cases can be found in Tables 1, 2, and 3. Table 2 (at pages 8 to 10) gives the number of cases in each issue category in each state, and this information is condensed in the other two tables. Table 1 (at page 7) gives the total number of cases in each issue category, and Table 3 (at page 17) gives the total number of cases in each state, along with the number of major case types. The placement of cases in the major categories (e.g., handicap cases or discipline cases) is probably very accurate, but the placement into subtypes, especially for handicap cases, is occasionally incorrect because we did not receive enough information from the lawyers.

Litigation about handicapped students predominates, comprising almost half the cases in the catalog, far above the other major types (discipline with 18 percent, sports regulation with 11 percent, and equal protection with 10 percent). Handicap cases were easier to locate than others; the discipline cases were difficult to track down in many states (see pages 26 to 28). Hence, these three tables, while representing the distribution in the catalog, do not present a totally accurate view of the proportions of the various types of cases nationwide. A rough estimate is that 35 to 40 percent of the education cases involving students filed after 1976 are handicap cases, and a quarter or so are discipline cases. Sports regulation cases and equal protection cases each comprise some 10 percent, and a fourth or a fifth are other students' rights cases. These numbers, it must be stressed, are only rough estimates.

The numbers and types of cases differ widely from state to state. States with large populations, of course, tend to have far more cases than the smaller states, but in general the small states have more cases per student, probably because they have less-developed administrative tribunals to handle student litigation. (The number of cases per 100,000 students in Table 3 was computed by using the number of elementary and secondary school students in 1979, according to Table 247 in the Statistical Abstract of the United States 1980.)

Otherwise, there seems to be little pattern that may help explain the widely varying numbers of cases, and cases per student, shown in Table 3. The only noteworthy regional factor is that the New England states have unusually large numbers of cases per student. The states with many cases tend to be those with very large numbers of handicap cases, especially Massachusetts and the District of Columbia. The state with the fewest cases per student, New Jersey, has a comprehensive administrative appeals procedure for education cases, so that most litigation ends before reaching the courts. The relatively small numbers of cases in California and Kansas, it should be noted, are probably due in part to comparatively incomplete information obtained there, as explained later. As a practical matter, litigation in New York and perhaps a few other states is much greater than suggested by Table 3 because the state court cases there are usually not filed in court until ready to go to trial, whereas in most jurisdictions cases are filed when the complaint is served.

The differences among states in total cases are at least equalled by differences in the types of cases. Noteworthy again, are the few states with very large numbers of handicap cases, considering the size of the states. Besides the District of Columbia and Massachusetts, these include Connecticut, Delaware, Hawaii, Maryland, Nebraska, Vermont, and Virginia. The discipline and sports cases are also quite unevenly distributed. Indiana, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Texas stand out as states where discipline problems seem likely to reach the courts. The sports regulation cases are particularly numerous in Idaho, Indiana, Mississippi, Nevada, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Texas. A few other states might rank high in sports litigation, but, as indicated in Table 8, at page 27, the information obtained was incomplete.

Status of Cases. Half of the cases in the catalog have been decided by the courts; and most of the remaining cases are pending without decision (see Table 4). The relatively high percentage of cases decided, and the low percentage of cases settled or withdrawn, is partly due to the fact that temporary restraining orders and preliminary injunctions were counted as decisions for plaintiffs (unless later withdrawn by the court), because attorneys generally considered them the major ruling in the case. This is exemplified by the numerous sports cases where students wished to play on the school team during the next few weeks but where a trial was not possible until after the season. More non-handicap cases than handicap cases are shown as decided, mainly because most of the latter are comparatively recent filings (see Table 6, page 22). Education cases, with a high decision rate and a low settlement rate, are a noteworthy exception to the 90 percent settlement rate that is widely believed to obtain in ordinary civil litigation.

Plaintiffs won slightly more often than defendants in the trial courts, but the defendants won almost twice as often at the appellate stage. Plaintiffs in handicap cases were slightly less likely to win than plaintiffs in other cases.

The Plaintiff. The student or parent (or an organization representing the interests of the student or parent) is the plaintiff in 86 percent of the cases (82 percent of the handicap cases and 89 percent of the others). A school or state education agency is the plaintiff (and the student/parents the defendant) in 12 percent of the cases. In the remaining cases, a little over two percent, the plaintiff could not be classified as either student/parent or school/state.

The number of plaintiffs in each case is usually small. Three-fourths of the cases have a single plaintiff (a parent or guardian is not counted as a separate plaintiff), and another 12 percent have only two or three plaintiffs. Only about 5 percent have more than ten children as named plaintiffs, and only about 18 percent of the cases were filed as class actions. Handicap cases tended to have fewer plaintiffs than other cases: 83 percent had a single plaintiff, as opposed to 69 percent for other cases, but there were as many class actions in handicap cases as in other cases. When the attorneys were asked whether they filed primarily to create precedent or primarily to obtain a remedy for the plaintiffs, about 70 percent said primarily for the plaintiffs, and 30 percent gave precedent as a primary goal. There was virtually no difference between handicap and non-handicap cases as to the purpose of filing.

Review of Agency Decisions. About a third of the cases are appeals from decisions of state-level administrative tribunals (we have data for 87 percent of the cases). Because P.L. 94-142 requires plaintiffs to exhaust administrative remedies (20 U.S.C. 1415), it would be expected that most of the handicap cases would be appeals from agency decisions. This requirement, however, is frequently disregarded; only 58 percent of the handicap cases are appeals from state-level agency decisions. Such appeals constitute 12 percent of the non-handicap cases.

Types of Plaintiff Attorneys. Table 5 shows that private practitioners represented plaintiffs in 63 percent of the cases. In nearly all the remaining cases, the plaintiffs' attorneys worked for nonprofit organizations; the largest subcategory, legal service lawyers, handled 19 percent of the cases. Civil liberties lawyers, who represented plaintiffs in 6 percent of the cases, are generally private practitioners also, but are not counted here as such because they worked as volunteers for the Civil Liberties Union. The types of plaintiffs' attorneys in handicap cases are very much like attorneys in the other cases except that, as might be expected, handicap cases have fewer Civil Liberties Union lawyers and more lawyers from protection and advocacy agencies. Plaintiffs in only one percent of the cases were not represented by lawyers.

When Filed. Tables 6 and 7 (pages 22, 23) show the year of filing for the cases located. Considerably more were filed in 1980 than in other years, and the numbers are progressively less in prior years. This is partly due to the search strategy; we made a greater effort to find the later cases, and lawyers probably remembered recent cases better than earlier ones. Table 7 indicates that the trend toward more cases in later years was much stronger in some states than others. (Incomplete information probably accounts for the relatively few 1977 and 1978 cases shown for California, Kansas, Ohio, Oregon, Rhode Island, and South Carolina.) Another reason for the increased number of cases in the later years is the onslaught of litigation following P.L. 94-142, which gave rise to causes of action in federal courts starting in October 1977.

The number of cases given for 1981 is incomplete. The search ended in early June 1981, and most of the telephone calls to attorneys took place months earlier. The proportion of 1981 cases differs from state to state because the search was completed in some states sooner than in others. The search ended early in 1981 for Connecticut, Minnesota, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, and Wisconsin.

Federal or State Court. Almost half (45 percent) of the cases were filed in the federal courts. Plaintiff's attorneys in handicap cases selected the federal court 56 percent of the time, while 36 percent of the non-handicap cases went there. One reason for this difference is that federal law issues are more common in handicap cases; but there are many other important factors influencing the choice between the federal and state courts, such as the perceived attitudes of the different judges, the differences in the amount of delay, and the relative convenience of the location of the courts. This topic will be given extensive treatment in a later report.

6. CASE SEARCH PROCEDURES

The case search procedure involved as many sources of information as possible. In all, the most productive technique was "snowballing"-- that is, asking people likely to be familiar with education cases in a state to tell us about such cases and to suggest others whom we might contact, then asking the others for additional cases and names, and so on. The search strategy contained several steps, listed below.

Initial Search. The first task was to telephone national and regional organizations that deal with education law issues. We contacted over 50 such organizations, including education law reporting services, national associations of local education agencies, and organizations advancing the rights of blacks, Chicanos, women, children, the handicapped, and other special groups. The purpose initially was to obtain advice and information about how to organize the search for cases. We also gathered lists of education law attorneys, and we were given the names of a few cases, although most national-level organizations have very little information about individual cases. A major exception is the Center for Law and Education, in Cambridge, Massachusetts, which advises legal service organizations on education law matters. We searched its files and obtained complaints and other papers from more than a hundred cases.

Search Plan for Each State--Snowballing. The search plan for locating cases relied, in the first instance, on contacting knowledgeable lawyers about their cases, requesting leads to other cases, and seeking names of other lawyers likely to have education cases. To start the "snowballing" chain in each state we telephoned the following:

1. Counsel for the state education agency and the state board of education (generally lawyers in the state attorney general's office assigned to handle education cases).
2. The persons responsible for operating the administrative appeal process in special education cases and, if applicable, other types of student cases; also, generally, the state's special education director.
3. Counsel for the state association of school boards (or the director, if the association did not have legal counsel).
4. Counsel for local school boards in the largest city in the state and in all cities larger than 100,000 population (and, of course, any other school board attorneys referred to during the search process.)
5. Local civil rights groups--especially protection and advocacy agencies, youth rights advocates, the American Civil Liberties Union branches, and the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under the Law.

6. Directors or education law specialists of legal service organizations in the largest city in the state and in all cities over 100,000 population; also, the central legal service office for the state, or for large regions of the state, where those offices existed.
7. The director of the state athletic association and, in most states, the counsel for the association.
8. Miscellaneous sources: attorneys who had written recent law review articles on education law, attorneys mentioned in newspaper articles as being involved in education litigation, and other attorneys mentioned in the literature who might be knowledgeable about education litigation.

Each person called was asked to give information about "education cases involving students" and about other lawyers to contact. The first task of the snowballing search was to obtain cases from defense lawyers, either over the phone or, especially when they had many cases, by requesting a written list. The great majority were helpful, giving us information about their cases and the name and telephone number of the plaintiff's attorneys and referring us to other relevant cases and other attorneys in the education field. We received the same kind of help from almost all the plaintiffs' attorneys. Legal service lawyers and other non-profit groups were particularly interested and cooperative. Some attorneys, however, were understandably unwilling to take the time to review their files for cases they no longer remembered. We kept extensive records of the snowballing process, and it was deemed to be complete when almost every case or person mentioned had been referred to earlier.

Published Sources. A further source of cases was found in references in published materials, although only a small percent of the cases in the catalog have been published. The foremost published source, of course, consisted of reported opinions, found through ordinary legal research. Next we used several dozen books and reporting services containing references to published and unpublished education cases. These sources are listed on page 29. Some were used near the end of the search, as discussed later, to enable us to estimate the thoroughness of our search. Infrequent but helpful sources of information were statewide digests of education cases prepared by school board attorneys or by the state education department. Extensive lists exist in Illinois, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania.

Newspaper clippings were a further source of published information about education cases. We subscribed to a newsclipping service from October 1980 through April 1981 and received information on almost ninety cases falling within the scope of this study. A half-dozen well-known cases, such as the Baton Rouge and Los Angeles desegregation cases, accounted for the vast majority of the clippings received.

Detailed Case Information. We relied on telephone interviews with plaintiffs' attorneys for most of the information in the catalog; in roughly half of the cases we also have information from school board attorneys, from complaints or other pleadings in the case, or from published accounts of the case. Telephone calls to plaintiffs' attorneys were quite short; they usually lasted five to ten minutes per case, and few attorneys had more than two cases. Less than one percent declined to provide information about their cases.

Circulating Draft Catalogs. A preliminary state catalog of cases was circulated to attorneys in each state. We sent copies to all plaintiffs' attorneys with cases in the catalog, to other attorneys contacted who had a substantial education law practice, and to all others who asked for copies. We requested that they respond if they wanted the final version of the catalog and we asked for corrections and additions. A number sent in corrections, but only a few mentioned new cases falling within the scope of our survey.

7. ESTIMATES OF COMPLETENESS

Although we have tried to be as thorough as possible, our results are far from complete. Table 8 (page 27) shows categories of cases where we believe our information is particularly incomplete. Also, several states are especially incomplete for specific years, as discussed above on pages 21 and 22.

Our ability to locate cases of a particular type depended primarily on the concentration of defense attorneys for that type of case. For example, sports eligibility cases were relatively easy to find since, in almost all states, they are defended by a single attorney representing the athletic association. In special education cases, a state agency is usually made a party defendant, so attorneys in the attorney general's office or in the department of education defend these cases on behalf of the state. We were able, therefore, to locate these cases easily if, as usually happened, these defense attorneys helped us. Most of the other types of cases, especially discipline cases, are widely scattered, and were located by calling local sources, particularly school board counsel and legal service attorneys. Here our search was more hit or miss.

Another factor, of course, is the publicity given cases. Attorneys are more likely to know about interesting or important civil liberties litigation, such as desegregation cases, bilingual education cases, and disputes about school newspapers, than about the mundane discipline actions for marijuana possession or disputes as to whether the student is a resident of the school district.

In order to obtain more definite, but still far from exact, information about the completeness of our search, several published sources were not consulted until after the snowballing was almost completed. The cases from these publications are predominantly pending cases or cases decided without published opinion. The results of the comparison between our search and these publications varied greatly from source to source, but all together they suggest that, in the end, we have located about 60 and 70 percent of the cases, with a higher percentage of the handicap cases. The results from the various sources were as follows.

Snowballing had uncovered 84 percent of the cases in The P.L. 94-142 Case Reporter; the latest edition of the Reporter contained 76 cases relevant to our study, and almost all of the 12 cases we had not located were early cases filed before 1979. Another indication of the greater difficulty in finding earlier cases is that we had found only 58 percent of the 26 applicable cases shown in Education of the Handicapped Litigation Brought Under P.L. 94-142 and Section 504, which was published in September 1978.

As for the sports cases, we had initially found only a quarter of the one hundred relevant cases in the Mutual Legal Aid Pact Summary of Cases and the Legal Letter, but we had not yet called the prime source of information about sports cases, counsel for the various state high school athletic associations. Since the snowballing was supplemented by all these sources, we have probably found the great majority of sports cases. The exceptions are noted in Table 8.

Checking our initial results against newspaper clippings compiled by a clipping service from October 1980 through April 1981 showed that we had found only 34 of the 88 cases that fell within the scope of our survey. We had most of the handicap cases, but less than a third of the discipline cases and less than a tenth of the sports cases reported. The newspaper cases were, however, quite recent; many of them were filed after we had called the lawyers in their locality, and others were so new that word about them had not spread through the legal community.

The final comparison was made with the Clearinghouse Review, which contains legal service cases. We had located 79 percent of the 127 cases falling within the scope of the catalog in the May 1977 to April 1981 issues. This, however, overstates the completeness of the search because we had obtained several of the cases from the files of the Center for Law and Education, which advises legal service organizations and presumably informs the Review of recent developments.

We, of course, included the cases found from these publications, and asked the attorneys for information about other cases. This additional search, therefore, increases the degree of completeness beyond that suggested by the percentages given in the above comparisons.

We estimate that the catalog is approximately 60 to 70 percent complete. We base this estimate on the comparisons with published materials mentioned above, on known gaps in our snowballing search (see Tables 7 and 8), and on guesses about what types of cases are not likely to be widely known. We estimate that the catalog is about 80 percent complete for handicap cases; about two-thirds complete for most other types of cases, including sports, religion, and civil rights cases; but 50 percent or less complete for discipline cases and cases relating to residency requirements for school attendance.
