ABSTRACT

Summary data and narrative profiles are provided on state postsecondary education structures (governing boards, coordinating boards and agencies). Following an overview of the status of state coordination and governance of higher education in 1987, tabular data on state boards and agencies are provided, including: (1) structure of statewide/coordination/governing boards; (2) agency responsibility; (3) state basic legal structures; (4) membership--central state coordinating and/or governing boards and public institutional and multicampus governing boards; (5) student and faculty membership--central state coordinating and/or governing boards and public institutional and multicampus governing boards; and (6) state-level agencies and committees. Part 2 consists of a narrative profile of the state postsecondary education structures in each state. Each narrative profile includes information on the coordinating and/or governing agency, institutional governing boards, master planning, state student assistance and loan agencies, the state board of vocational education, the state-level organization of private colleges and universities, licensure/approval agencies, and statutory and other committees. A listing of addresses and phone numbers of state higher education executive officers is appended. (KM)

FOREWORD

This document consolidates under one cover material previously published by ECS in three separate items: Survey of the Structure of State Coordinating or Governing Boards and Institutional and Multicampus Governor Boards of Postsecondary Education, last published in 1983; the narrative profiles of each state's structure from the State Postsecondary Education Profiles Handbook, last published in 1983; and the commentary on the status of higher education structure from State Governance of Education: 1983.

We greatly appreciate the assistance of the state of higher education executives and their staffs who were the source of the information in most states. We also appreciate the assistance of James R. Mingle, Executive Director, State Higher Education Executive Officers.

We are especially grateful for the tireless work of Rochelle Torscher who compiled much of the data.

ECS welcomes inquires about the information in this document or about the general subject of state coordination and governance of higher education.

STATE COORDINATION AND GOVERNANCE OF HIGHER EDUCATION — 1987

By Aims C. McGuinness Jr.

For the remaining years of this decade, the relationship between state government and higher education will be more intense, complex and potentially troublesome than in any period in recent past. Renewed recognition is being given to the central role that higher education plays in states' economic futures — in preparing a work force for the changing economy and in bolstering states' positions in the intensively competitive world market. This is fueling a new sense of urgency about the effectiveness and responsiveness of states' systems for coordinating, governing and financing colleges and universities. It is not uncommon to hear a governor or state legislator remark, "We cannot hope to compete with other states for new industry and jobs if we keep spreading limited resources across too many mediocre institutions, and if we can't get our act together amid intense bickering among various institutional interests." Or, "I'd be willing to put much more money into higher education if only I had confidence that the priorities were more clearly defined, that institutional missions were more sharply focused and that the existing coordinating structure was willing and able to make tough choices among competing options."

This sense of urgency is leading many states to reexamine their higher education systems. From 1985 through 1987, at least 22 states had special studies or blue-ribbon commissions on higher education. In at least 14 of these states, changes in state structure for coordination and governance was an issue. Several other states either enacted or seriously debated reorganization proposals.

What are the underlying issues behind this activity? Economic development continues to be the dominant theme. State officials, who sense the urgency of the world competitive scene, are often frustrated by the difficulties in getting responses from a highly decentralized and often aloof higher education system. This frustration can lead to proposals for restructuring.

Also important is a perceived mismatch between the existing higher education system and the changing needs of the state and its people. Issues include changes in demography, the growing needs of adults for retraining and professional development and special concerns about minority participation in higher education.

Concerns are also consistently expressed that the higher education system may be overextended; that limited public resources are being spread over too many institutions with too little attention to differentiation of missions and quality. Accountability—especially a focus on educational outcomes—is a frequent emphasis.

Throughout the past 15 years, several other perennial issues have motivated governors and legislators to propose that higher education systems be restructured. These may be long-standing irritants whose urgency increases as economic conditions worsen.

Actual or potential duplication of high-cost graduate and professional programs. The issue may arise in a variety of ways: through pressures of a growing urban area to have accessible graduate and professional programs which would duplicate or threaten support for similar programs at the state's major research university (frequently located away from major urban areas) or through successful efforts to influence legislators or "end-runs" by institutions to get legislative approval of new programs.

- Visible conflict between the aspirations of two institutions (often under separate governing boards) located in one geographic area. Major reorganization proposals (merger, consolidation, etc.) usually occur after years of less gramatic efforts to achieve improved cooperation and coordination.
- Legislative reaction to intense institutional lobbying. As the governor and legislature face politically difficult and unattractive choices, increasingly focused on curtailment rather than expansion of programs, intense lobbying by competing institutional interests becomes a major irritant. State task forces frequently seek ways to push the battles away from the immediate political process in the hope that they can be resolved within the higher education community.
- Proposals to close, merge or change the missions of institutions. The issue may involve small, isolated rural institutions or institutions that are in close proximity. There is often a sense that the current system is unable to contain political actions that appear to be contrary to good planning and efficient use of resources. For example, an influential legislator may succeed in blocking action to change the mission or close an institution in his or her district because of serious economic consequences for the area; or a legislator may succeed in getting a bill enacted to change the mission of an institution in his or her district despite evidence that the new mission is inappropriate.
- O Concerns about the need for improved coordination among the many institutions offering one- and two-year vocational, technical or occupational programs. In the past five years, more than 20 states have addressed issues concerning coordination and governance of community colleges and technical institutes.
- Concerns about the effectiveness of the state coordinating or governing agency. In states where serious reorganization proposals are made, political leaders frequently express opinions that the existing board (or its staff) is providing ineffective leadership or lacks the political influence and judgment to address the critical issues facing the state. These issues may be long-standing conflicts such as mentioned above. The sense often is that the existing board is more focused on detailed administrative, regulatory or internal management affairs than on planning and the strategic policy issues facing the system or state. Reorganization is often proposed not simply because the formal authority of the previous board was inadequate to the task but because of a desire to change the leadership and personalities involved in the process.

Description of State Structures

As background for a review of the current status and recent changes in state structures, the following is a summary of basic functions and approaches in coordination and governance.

Basic State Functions

States usually carry out four functions:

- Governance of public institutions. All states assign responsibility for the operation of public colleges and universities to governing boards. The names of the boards vary, but "board of trustees" and "board of regents" are the most common. The responsibility of these boards is much the same as that of a board of directors of any nonprofit corporation. They hire the chief executive, establish policies and approve actions related to faculty and other personnel; ensure institutional fiscal integrity; and perform other planning, policy and management functions. In some states, there is a separate governing board for each public institution; in other states, "multicampus boards" govern more than one institution or campus. In still other states, "consolidated" governing boards are responsible for all institutions in the state.
- Comprehensive planning. Most states carry out some form of comprehensive planning; that is, planning that examines the long-range higher education needs in the state, establishes state goals and objectives, considers the resources of all institutions in the state (often both public and private) and recommends public policy priorities. In some states, this process is focused on a "master plan"; in others, planning is carried out through special studies of specific issues resulting in a series of reports rather than in a single document.
- Academic program review. Most states examine proposals from institutions for new academic programs, and an increasing number of states examine existing programs. During the period of rapid growth of the 1960s, states established program-review mechanisms to curb unnecessary duplication and encourage development of good programs. Now, as resources and enrollments decline, the emphasis is on providing for orderly modification or termination of programs.
- o Resource allocation. All states have processes for reviewing and approving institutional operating and capital budgets and budgets for state student assistance programs.

Beyond these functions, states administer state ar I federal grant programs (state student assistance programs are the largest of these) and regulate which institutions can operate within the state (institutional licensure or authorization).

Status of State Structures

The status of state structures as of the end of 1987 according to the broad categories of "consolidated governing board" and "coordinating board" is shown in Table I. The table lists the states according to the extent of the authority of the principal higher education board or agency.

- Twenty-three states have adopted consolidated governing-board structures. In these states, most, if not all, public institutions are governed by a single board. In other words, rather than having governing boards for each institution or for groups of institutions, these states have elected to give one board operating responsibility for all institutions.
- o Twenty-three states have adopted coordinating-board structures. In these states, a state agency has been established between the governing boards of institutions and the governor and legislature. The organization, legal authority and functions of coordinating boards vary greatly from state to state. In general, these boards allow state governments to carry out centralized functions such as comprehensive planning and review of budgets and academic programs, while also allowing for the decentralized management of institutions by governing boards. Coordinating boards also can play a critical role in negotiating the resolution of tensions between state government and the higher education institutions, or among segments of higher education. They do not hire campus chief executives. Four states (Alaska, Oregon, Florida and New Hampshire) have both a consolidated governing board or multiscampus system for their senior institutions as well as a coordinating or planning agency and thus are listed twice in Table I.

o Four states (Delaware, Michigan, Nebraska and Vermont) and the District of Columbia have higher education planning agencies with limited authority. In each of these states, higher education governance is the responsibility of two or more boards, while in the District of Columbia, all public institutions are governed by a single consolidated board.

Moving from left to right in Table I, the states with the most comprehensive statewide governing boards are listed on the left, whereas the states with coordinating boards or state agencies with only limited planning authority are listed toward the right. The extent of a state agency's authority to approve academic programs, followed by the board's role in the budgetary process, are used to place states in different columns.

The organizational structure, authority and staffing of the higher education systems listed under "consolidated governing board" vary far more than the two categories listed in Table I. The board in Wyoming is essentially responsible for a single institution. The governing boards in Florida, Georgia, Maine, Massachusetts, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Oregon, Utah, West Virginia and Wisconsin have a chief executive officer with the title of chancellor or president who has line authority related to the campuses. The boards in Mississippi, Montana, North Dakota, Rhode Island and Utah have the chief staff persons with the title of "commissioners" with leadership responsibility but not line authority related to the campuses. In Arizona, Idaho, Iowa, Kansas and South Dakota, the boards have executive officers who are responsible primarily for staff support to the board rather than policy leadership and line authority for the system.

Also not reflected in Table I are the variety of governing board arrangements within states with coordinating boards. These range from states in which each institution has its own governing board (Washington, for example) to states in which all institutions are under two or more consolidated governing boards or multicampus universities (California, Connecticut, Illinois and Tennessee, as examples), to states with a mixed pattern of single-institution boards, consolidated governing boards and multicampus universities (Colorado and Maryland, as examples).

Other subtle differences among states that cannot be shown in an illustration underscore the danger of attempts to transpose one state's structure to another. For example:

O Different roles of the legislative and executive branches of state government. In some states, the legislature plays the dominant role, and effective relations with that branch of government are essential to the success of the coordinating or governing mechanism. In other states, the governor is the key figure.

Education Commission of the States 11/87

- Differences in size of systems. In general, states that have consolidated governing boards rather than coordinating boards have systems of higher education that are less complex and enrollments are smaller. Seventeen of the 23 states with consolidated governing boards have enrollments in public institutions of fewer than 100,000; 9 have enrollments of fewer than 25,000. Exceptions are principally the states that have created consolidated boards over the past decade Massachusetts, North Caroline and Wisconsin. In contrast, 19 of the 23 states with coordinating boards have enrollments in public institutions of more than 100,000, 9 have enrollments of more than 200,000. To maintain decentralized governance in states with coordinating boards, 9 public institutions are governed by two or more statewide multicampus board in 9 states and by both multi-campus and single-institution boards in the other 16 states.
- O Differences in advocacy role. Governing boards generally function as advocates for the institutions they govern, especially in the budget process. Coordinating boards tend to look at issues from the perspective of state government. Each plays a fundamentally different role in the state policy process. This difference is most pronounced in comprehensive or master planning. Coordinating boards usually carry out planning related to all higher education sectors. In contrast, planning by governing-board states almost always focuses on the needs of the institutions governed, which means that these states generally lack formal mechanisms for comprehensive statewide planning.
- Differences in state-level functions. States with coordinating boards centralize certain state-level functions that governing boards do not ordinarily perform. For example, governing boards usually do not perform state government functions that apply to independent institutions or to public institutions they do not govern (often community colleges or technical institutes). They usually do not administer federal and state student financial assistance and institutional grant programs (although there are several exceptions in the area of student aid), and they also do not ordinarily license or authorize institutions. States with governing boards also usually find it necessary to carry out elsewhere in the executive and legislative branches certain oversight functions related to all higher education sectors, such as budget analysis, program review or analysis of program duplication. In general, then, states find that consolidated governing boards can address some objectives, like providing a single accountability point for the efficient management of public institutions, but that certain "state-interest" functions must be performed elsewhere in the executive and legislative branches of state government. Coordinating boards generally perform these "state-interest" functions, although (as stressed earlier) the extent to which states consolidate all functions under one coordinating board varies greatly from state to state.
- O Different traditions regarding the state role in relation to institutions. In some states, the government has traditionally treated all public institutions as state-owned and regulated agencies. The institutions are subject to the same procedural controls applicable to other state agencies. In other states, institutions are treated as state-assisted, privately controlled entities and are exempt from most state procedural controls. In still other states, the pattern is mixed.
- o Intangible, subtle differences in tradition and quality of leadership. What makes all classification difficult is that perhaps the most important distinguishing features of any state's higher education system relate to matters of tradition and leadership. While traditions may endure, the leadership capabilities of board members, the staffs of statewide agencies and the chief executive of institutions change. A board that is recognized as strong and effective at one point may be seen as weak and ineffective at another, primarily because of changes in composition of the board and behavior of board members. Far more than the formal authority of a board, the factors that most frequently define board effectiveness are the prestige and quality of board members; the ability of the board to function as a cohesive group rather than as a collection of individual interests; the ability of the board to organize its work to emphasize policy rather than administration through careful design of agendas and effective use of committees; and the reputation of the board staff among both political and institutional leaders for its objectivity, fairness, sound judgment and commitment to conflict resolution.

Changes in State Structure

The basic patterns of state-level organization of higher education across the nation today were in place in the early 1970s, with the exception of only a few states. The year 1972 marked the culmination of more than a decade of development of state higher education agencies formed to coordinate the massive expansion of higher education in the late 1950s and 1960s. By that year, 47 states had established either consolidated governing boards responsible for all senior institutions (and in some cases, community and junior colleges also) or coordinating boards responsible for statewide planning and coordination of two or more governing boards. Three small states with limited number of institutions continued to handle statewide higher education issues through the existing governing boards and direct involvement of the governor and the legislature without a special statewide coordinating or governing agency.

Through the 1970s, 12 states made changes in higher education structure that could be characterized as significant: 7 states that had previously adopted a coordinating board as opposed to a statewide governing board took steps to strengthen that coordinating function, either modifying the authority of the existing agency or replacing that agency with a new body with increased regulatory authority. Two states replaced their coordinating bodies with statewide governing boards. The other 3 states made adjustments that reflected their unique political and structural situations.

The period of the 1970s was one of maturation of the coordinating and governing patterns established in the previous decade. It was a period, however, of continued strengthening of the authority of state boards. Of even greater significance, the 1970s saw a major increase in the involvement of other executive branch agencies and legislative staffs in higher education affairs, especially in budgetary matters. Increasingly sophisticated legislators, backed by professional staffs, became more directly involved in both the substance and procedures of state higher education policy.

In the early 1980s, the pattern of the 1970s continued. Major changes occurred in only a few states. Several states (Florida, Minnesota, North Carolina and Tennessee, as examples) reorganized state-level governance of community colleges, vocational-technical institutes and related programs. Other states such as Pennsylvania reorganized and consolidated the governance of major higher education sectors. Rhode Island abandoned its single board for all levels of education and established a separate governing board for its three public higher education institutions. The most far-reaching changes occurred in Massachusetts, where a new statewide governing board was established to replace all existing state agencies and boards, and in Connecticut, where the idea of a single governing board was rejected and a new and strengthened coordinating board was established.

Changes since 1985. From 1985 through 1987, approximately 17 states considered higher education reorganization proposals ranging from relatively minor changes in state board authority to major restructuring of the total system. Actual changes were made in only 5 states.

- o In Colorado and Washington, the existing coordinating boards were replaced by similar but strengthened coordinating bodies. In both cases, a range of alternatives was debated, including a single statewide "superboard" and realignment of institutional boards under segmental boards boards with responsibility for several institutions.
- o In Alaska, in a change brought about by the board of regents of the University of Alaska and not by the governor or legislature, all the institutions under the university were realigned under three university centers, each headed by a chancellor. Each of the community colleges is now assigned to one of these centers. The formal authority of the Alaska Postsecondary Education Commission was not changed, but budget and staff reductions have severely curtailed the capacity of that agency to carry out its statutory functions.
- o In Oregon, the Oregon Education Coordinating Commission was abolished and the agency's functions were continued under the Oregon Office of Educational Policy and Planning in the governor's office.
- o In Texas, as the result of recommendations of the Select Committee on Higher Education, the name of the Coordinatin Board, Texas College and University System, was changed to the Texas Higher Education Coordinating Board. The board's authority was expanded to give it power to set enrollment limits and to create a realistic and effective master plan for higher education.

In several other states, proposals were made by blue-ribbon commissions or debated in legislatures but were not adopted before the end of 1987.

- o In Maryland, debate continues regarding a range of alternatives from consolidating all the senior institutions under one governing board, on the one hand, to replacing the existing coordinating board with a new but similar board and establishing governing boards for each of the state colleges currently under a single segmental board, on the other.
- The California Commission for the Review of the Master Plan for Higher Education recommended that the governance structure of the community colleges be strengthened substantially. It recommended the creation of a community college system to be administered as a unified state/local system by the board of governors with broad policy-making and management responsibilities in both academic and financial affairs.
- A blue-ribbon commission in Oklahoma recommended that the present system of 17 governing boards be reduced to 5, focused on three tiers, and that the role and authority of the existing coordinating board be retained. While these recommendations were not adopted by the legislature, other options for strengthening the higher education system continue to be discussed.
- The Kansas legislature debated proposals to place the community colleges under their own state board or under the jurisdiction of the state board of regents. No final action was taken before the end of 1987.

A significant change in governance of a different kind occurred in New Jersey. State college autonomy legislation enacted in 1986 strengthened the independent governance of the state colleges and exempted them from a number of detailed state fiscal and procedural controls. The legislation empowers the boards of trustees to manage their institutions' fiscal operations; authorizes the colleges to contract and handle all their own transactions without going to the state treasury; and establishes a state college governing-board association to oversee the boards' position in the new governing arrangement.

Consolidated Governance as an Option

A frequently asked question is: Has there been any discernible trend toward single statewide consolidated governing boards such as were adopted in North Carolina and Wisconsin in the early 1970s and in Massachusetts in 1980? In most of the states that have undergone major reorganization in recent years, the option of a single governing board has been considered along with a variety of other options. What may be most significant is that in the 15 or more states where this option has been considered in the past 10 years, it has been adopted in only 1. In ali others, the choice has been to retain but strengthen an existing coordinating mechanism while maintaining a separate system of institutional governance. Nevertheless, the idea C a consolidated governing board continues to be of great interest in 3 or 4 states.

Despite differences in formal authority, both coordinating boards and consolidating governing boards have been criticized by governors and legislators in a number of states because of a tendency to focus on administrative, regulatory or internal governance issues and to give insufficient attention to the difficult policy issues facing the state. What these states appear to be seeking is not necessarily more centralized governance or strong regulatory control but more effective policy leadership from the state's higher education board.

New Themes in Proposals for Improved State Coordination.

Several themes have been emphasized with increasing frequency in state debates about reorganization.

- o Increasing need for more effective state policy leadership. This is reflected in calls for actions by state boards and their executives as well as institutional leaders to set forth a vision for how higher education can contribute to the state's future, raise the level of the state's aspiration for the quality of its higher education system and pursue strategies that will resolve long-standing policy dilemmas. There may be a sense that the existing way the state is organized does not provide a means for these broader issues to be raised and addressed. Or, state leaders may feel that the intensity of political battles about one issue or another in higher education is hurting not only higher education but also the state as a whole.
- o Continuing interest in decentralization and deregulation. A countervailing tendency to the interest in stronger state policy leadership is the continuing interest, motivated by trends in the private sector and other governmental arenas, in decentralization and deregulation. Options either already adopted by some states or under consideration by others include:
 - Increasing recognition of the importance of institutional governing boards. Actions include: efforts to improve the quality of gubernatorial appointments to governing boards, encouraging greater participation of board members in training programs and increased delegation to boards of management responsibilities previously controlled by one or more state agencies. Also related to this are conscious efforts to establish conditions that are conducive to attracting, retaining and rewarding effective college and university presidents.

- Increasing financial management flexibility for institutions. The most extensive changes involve a significant reduction in the number of line items in the state budget and delegation of extensive authority to institutions for shifting funds among programs and accounts, for carry-over of funds at the end of the fiscal year and for retaining and investing institutional revenues. In other states, detailed procedural controls in areas such as purchasing and personnel previously handled by executive branch agencies have been delegated to institutions.
- Promoting institutional renewal through a combination of decentralized governance and increased use of incentives (changes in the base funding systems as well as new competitive categorical grant programs). These and other changes reflect a growing awareness of the limitations of traditional state fiscal and regulatory controls and an interest in exploring new policy tools aimed at stimulating effective decentralized management and a creative, "bottom-up" renewal within higher education. Deliberate attempts are being made to balance two approaches. On the one hand, centralized improvements will be made in strategic planning and resolution of major policy coordination issues. On the other hand, institutional renewal will be promoted through decentralized management and increased use of incentives rather than traditional policy directives and regulations.
- Continuing attention to mission differentiation and ways to encourage diversity. Issues regarding mission differentiation are certainly not new. What is apparent, however, is that despite the best efforts of state coordinating and governing bodies, the polities and basic incentive structures of state systems seem to lead to uniformity and encourage institutions to aspire to a single rather than multiple definitions of excellence and prestige. An underlying issue in several of the recent state studies has been a perception that the existing systems of finance and governance (including multi-campus universities) have tended to spread limited resources uniforming energy institutions rather than target resources in ways that respect and encourage institutional missions.

Premises

The following are premises that a state should seriously consider before embarking on a major reorganization of its higher education structure.

Reorganization should be seen as a means to an end rather than as an end in itself. States become embroiled in governance debates without defining the real issues that are driving the debate. In some cases, the real issue is that the governor or legislature has lost faith in a specific individual. In other cases, it may be that the state is frustrated with the seeming inability of the legislature to confront major policy dilemmas, and the hope is that through a new governing structure the issues can be faced and the deadlocks broken. The questions to ask are these: What specific issues need to be addressed? Is reorganization the only or the best means to do this?

- o Before reorganizing, the state should clarify its own vision and its goals and objectives for higher education. Reorganization without a sense of purpose or direction may be more damaging than maintaining the status quo.
- State interests are not necessarily the same as the sum of institutional interests. This does not mean that the two have to be in conflict. The point is that the state (or system) perspective is, by definition, different from that of the perspective of individual institutions. Each president should be primarily an advocate for his or her institution's needs while at the same time support efforts of others to ensure that the state and system needs are met. The state must be concerned with how the total system (institutions with different missions; public, private and proprietary institutions) fits together in a strategy to meet the state's education, social and economic goals. An effective coordinating mechanism is one that addresses the state or systemwide issues while at the same time reinforcing effective institutional leadership and governance.
- o State coordination is not the same as governance. Coordination is concerned primarily with the state and system perspective the framework within which governance takes place. Governance, on the other hand, relates to the direction and operation of individual institutions or groups of institutions. This distinction is important because states often try to solve coordination problems with governance alternatives or vice versa.
- o States should examine the total policy structure and procall, including the roles of the governor, agencies of the executive branch and the legislature, rather than focus exclusively on the formal higher education structure. It is not uncommon for states to consider changing the higher education structure when, in reality, the source of the problem lies elsewhere.
- o States should ask themselves whether reorganization is the only means for addressing the problems that have been identified. It may take three to five years for a newly organized system to begin to function effectively. For example, have changes in people in key positions, financing or other alternatives been explored?
- State coordination of higher education is the most complex, difficult balancing act in state government. There are no simple answers, no absolutes. Conflicts are the reality. The challenge is to resolve those conflicts as close to the real problems as possible. What worked at one point, with one set of actors, may not work at another point.

The complexity and intensity of the state government's relations with higher education over the next decade will demand new and creative solutions. What worked in the past may not be adequate today. State and institutional leaders share responsibility for ensuring that mechanisms are established to resolve major conflicts while advancing essential values and interests of both the states and higher education.

PART II — NARRATIVE PROFILES OF STATE POSTSECONDEARY STRUCTURES

ALABAMA

STATE STRUCTURE

State-Level Coordinating and/or Governing Agency

The Commission on Higher Education, the statutory coordinating agency for public higher education, was established in 1969. The commission is composed of 12 members, 10 of whom are appointed by the governor and i each by the lieutenant governor and specker of the house, and all are subject to confirmation by the senate. No more than 2 members can be from any one congressional district and each is charged with representing the state as a whole. Each serves a nine-year term of office. The statutory authority of the commission includes planning, coordination, budget review for individual institutions and recommendations of a consolidated budget and program review for the state's public senior and quitor institutions. Program review involves new program approval authority for all 57 public postsecondary institutions. The commission has advisory authority relative to the review of existing programs.

Institutional Governing Boards

The state has 2 multicampus governing boards established by the state constitution with powers delineated by the state legislature — the Board of Trustees of the University of Alabama for 3 senior institutions and the Board of Trustees of Auburn University for 2 senior institutions. Each of 8 other state universities has a separate governing board, a.J. I upper-division college, 15 junior colleges, 6 community colleges and 22 technical colleges or institutes that are governed by the State Board of Education.

Master Planning

This strategic planning process involves the development of a coordinated statewide mission statement for all postsecondary institutions and the refinement of the existing process whereby programs are reviewed and approved. Part of this refinement includes an annual survey of all existing institutional programs as measure; against their program proposals for the upcoming year and for the next five years. An additional refinement will tie the formal commission approval of new programs to an institution's academic pian as well as to its annual budget request.

State Student Assistance and Loan Agencies

A state student assis ance program was established in 1975 and is administered by the commission. The state participates in the federal State Student Incentive Grant (SSIG) program, a state tuition equalization program established in 1978 to provide direct assist a to resident students of certain private institutions in the stall additionally, legivation was passed in May 1980 authorizing the establishment of a guaranteed student loan program to be administered by the commission. This program became operational in March 1981. The commission also administers the Alabama Student Grant Program, Alabama National Guord

CALIFORNIA

STATE STRUCTURE

State-Level Coordinating and/or Governing Agency

On April 1, 1974, the California Postsecondary Commission assumed the budget and staff of the Coordinating Council for Higher Education, but the commission's duties and powers were greater than those assigned to its predecessor. This commission is not a regulatory agency or governing board. Rather, it serves as advisor to the legislature, governor and postsecondary institutions concerning major educational policies. It is required to establish a statewide data base with intensive information from all institutions, public and private. The commission has statutory authority to review institutional budgets, to advise on the need for and location of new campuses, and to review all proposals for new programs in the public segments. The commission's primary purpose is to prevent unnecessary duplication and to coordinate efforts among the educational segments. The commission's efforts are directed by its five-year plan which sets out educational goals and statewide issues, particularly those that concern large numbers of colleges, universities and proprietary schools.

The commission is composed of 15 members: 9 members are appointed from the general public: 3 by the governor, 3 by the Senate Rules Committee, and 3 by the Assembly's speaker. The remaining 6 members represent various sectors of education: 1 member from the Board of Regents of the University of California, 1 member from the Board of Trustees of the California State University, 1 member from the Board of Governors of the California Community College, 1 member from the State Board of Education, 1 member from the Council for Private Postsecondary Education, and 1 member appointed by the Governor to represent independent California Colleges and Universities. California does not have a state office of secretary of education and the commission is not a cabinet department. The executive officer is appointed by the commission and serves at its pleasure.

Institutional Governing Boards

Institutional governing boards in the state include: (1) The Board of Regents of the University of California, exercising constitutional powers over 9 public senior colleges, 3 research laboratories and numerous agricultural extension stations; (2) the Board of Trustees of the California State University and Colleges, exercising statutory authority over 19 public canior colleges and the consortiums and (3) 70 local community college district Boards of Trustees responsible for governing the 107 public two-year colleges. General direction and leadership is provided at the state level by the Board of Governors of the California Community Colleges.

Master Planning

The 1973 California legislature charged the Postsecondary Education Commission with a number of significant responsibilities relating to planning and coordination of all segments of postsecondary education. By statute, the commission is charged with integrating the individual segmental plans into a statewide five-year plan for postsecondary education. The plan is updated annually. Recently, though the Commission has chosen not to publish a "plan" per se but rather planning documents, such as "Prospectus 2000" — a series on the future and higher education.

State Student Assistance and Loan Agencies

The California Student Aid Commissio administers student scholarship and grant programs. The commission has established a state student loan guarantee agency for the federal guaranteed student loan program pursuant to the Education Amendments of 1976. State-Level Organization of Private Colleges and Universities

The Association of Independent California Colleges and Universities (AICCU) represents 61 of the more than 300 independent colleges and universities in the state. Voluntary or Statutory Committees for Articulation, Communication, etc., Between Elementary-Secondary and Postsecondary Education

A voluntary Articulation Conference, with an administrative committee, is composed of secondary school personnel, and representatives of the various segments of postsecondary education and of the Postsecondary Education Commission. In addition to an annual statewide meeting, committees operate in special interest areas throughout the year. Because the State Department of Education has removed its support this Council is virtually moribund.

Related Nongovernmental Organizations With Staffs and Programs ---Representing Both Public and Private Institutions

The California Association of Community Calleges includes both public and independent institutions. However, inasmuch as there are few independent two-year calleges in the state, the association is oriented primarily toward public institutions.
