ABSTRACT

Although parents and citizens in each community should be encouraged to participate in the educational policy-making process, it has been shown that public access to school board meetings is thwarted in many subtle ways. To gain information that would help to balance the interests of privacy and public access in every school district, the State Association of School Boards in each of the 50 states and the board of education in the District of Columbia were asked to reply to a two-page questionnaire about the provisions of their state's open meeting law as it applies to their member organizations--the local boards of education. Each chief state school officer was asked to supply information as to whom citizens should contact for more information or to file a complaint when they believed the law had been violated by their school boards. Findings indicate that four common elements allow the system of open government to break down: (1) vague requirements for compliance; (2) obtuse language; (3) too many exemptions from open meeting requirements; and (4) complex procedures for citizen participation or redress. The elements of open meetings are discussed as well as the fact that school board members may resist open deliberation. Based on the results of the survey, it is concluded that no state has an open meeting law that can be held up as ideal for protecting public access. A glossary is included, and appendixes making up the bulk of the document provide: (1) summaries of state open meeting laws as they apply to local school boards in 50 states and the District of Columbia; (2) two charts showing provisions of state open meeting laws and common topics allowed in executive sessions; (3) a list of resources; and (4) a list of state school board associations. ## Why We Wrote This Book

This book is the product of our own need to know and to be helpful to others. A recurring question asked of NCCE staff is "How open should local school board deliberations be?" It is asked by parents and citizens who want to hear and be heard at school board meetings, and it is asked by school board members who sometimes want to confer in private yet are also concerned that they represent their entire community--not just a few, vocal special interest groups.

We offer this book as a resource to parents, citizens and school board members who want to balance the interests of privacy and public access in their school district. In this volume you will find our compilation of 50 state open meeting laws (plus the District of Columbia's) as they apply to local school boards as well as a chart comparing the major provisions of open meeting laws, state by state. In addition, we provide some advice on how to develop local policies and practices which go beyond the minimum requirements of these laws to provide fair access to all citizens.

Acknowledgments

This book could not have been written without the full cooperation of the chief state school officers, their staffs and education agencies in every state; the State Associations of School Boards in every state and the school board of the District of Columbia. We wish to thank them for completing our open meeting law surveys, for numerous telephone consultations clarifying open meeting laws as they relate to local school boards, and for sending helpful written materials.

In addition, we would like to thank Common Cause, the Institute for Educational Leadership and the National School Boards Association for providing written resources relating to school boards and open meeting laws.

We are indebted to the following people for giving our manuscript a critical reading and making suggestions for improvement: Robert Freeman, Helen Oakes, Rose Musto, George Oser, Marilyn Smith, Catherine Spoto, Madonna Tibor, and to Marya Ungar for her kind comments about the project. We would also like to acknowledge the assistance of NCCE governing board members Anne Hallett and Martha Darling in identifying readers and school board members for interview.

We express special appreciation to those school board members who shared local policies and practices with us. Their candor has enabled us to ground the ideals of public access into everyday experience. As a result, we believe this publication will be more useful to citizens and school board members alike.

NCCE staff persons deserving special credit for their assistance are executive director Bill Rioux who took a personal interest in this project, Carl Marburger and Anne Henderson for their suggestions and support and Lisa Mondor and Linda Yaverbaum for their typing and proofreading assistance.

Introduction

America has a government unlike any other. As citizens we have a right to know and understand what is happening at every level. We also have the right to approach public officials with our concerns and requests. In short, we have a right to participate in the democratic process. That includes the public deliberations and decisions made by school boards, the locally appointed or elected officials who are entrusted with making policy decisions for the nation's 15,000 independent school districts.

Parents and citizens in each community should participate in the educational policy making process, for nowhere are the stakes higher. Our schools have a major influence over the personal happiness and future productivity of the nation's 45 million school-age children. The lay citizens who undertake the job of serving on school boards have a tremendous responsibility. They may not welcome all forms of public involvement, but the truth is, they cannot succeed without the help and support of their community.

So, in addition to our constitutional right to petition, there is a very practical reason why citizens should be allowed to attend and participate in local school board meetings: the survival and improvement of local school systems for all of our children. Yet many citizens complain that they are effectively or literally shut out. This unhappy situation may come about even though a school board is acting in good faith. Governing schools has become such a complicated business that some school board members confess to being confused about what is allowed and required in the way of public input. Genuine concern for the privacy of a disciplined student or for the integrity of a complex real estate negotiation may persuade school boards to hold hearings behind closed doors. But such executive sessions are abused when boards rationalize private meetings to "line up their votes before going public" or to avoid public testimony on a controversial issue.

In addition to being barred from executive sessions, citizens often claim to be thwarted in more subtle ways when they take the initiative to attend open school board meetings or to speak there. Such tactics as scheduling meetings during working hours, failing to publicize meetings, and putting red tape in the way of citizens who wish to have their concerns aired at an open meeting discourage public involvement. The result is that local school board meetings which should be a major forum for community collaboration seldom are.

To change the minds of school board members who consciously resist public involvement is a difficult undertaking. To inform school board members who are genuinely confused about their responsibilities under law is easier. If we do not succeed with the former goal by publishing this report, we at least hope to shed light on the situation for the latter.

By 1976 every state and the District of Columbia had an open meeting law on the books. These laws spell out citizens' rights to access school boards and other public bodies. Yet these statutes are not widely known or enforced; as one frustrated state official put it, they may be "the most violated law outside of jaywalking."<sup>1</sup> But they are there, to be exercised and strengthened by board members and community members alike. It is our hope that this publication will contribute to that process by

1. Clarifying the provisions of existing open meeting laws in each state
2. Pointing out strengths and weaknesses of the various statutes
3. Identifying key elements of a responsive local policy consistent with state open meeting law, and
4. Suggesting a course of action for those who want to improve local school board compliance with their state's law or encourage voluntary openness at local meetings.

Open communication works to everybody's benefit. When citizens are heard by, and can, in turn, hear the concerns and constraints of, the board, the best interests of the students can be served.

How This Study Came About: Motives and Methods

This study was inspired by what seemed at the onset a simple, straightforward question: What do state open meeting laws require of school boards? Everywhere we inquired, however, from citizen advocacy groups to state government agencies, the responses were remarkably similar: "That's a good question; somebody should find out." The resource coming closest to the information we sought was the Common Cause survey of state open meeting laws published in 1983. This looked at "sunshine laws" in general and included a model policy which is markedly close in intent and many details to our own conclusions and recommendations. We are indebted to Common Cause for the important groundwork they laid in this area. Still, we could find no comprehensive study which concentrated on the effect of open meeting or sunshine laws on local education policy making.

Our reason for searching was not idle curiosity. As a national advocacy organization dedicated to increasing public involvement in public education, NCCE champions the right of citizens to petition their local school board and to engage in the ultimate form of public school involvement, becoming members of the board themselves, if they so choose. Citizens and school board members tell us that participation in local school board affairs is not always an easy process. The calls and letters we receive indicate that confusion abounds. Among the most frequently asked questions:

- May citizens attend all meetings of the school board?
- Will they have the right to speak there, or to see and copy all documents discussed?
- When may a school board meet in private?
- May they vote in a closed meeting?
- Can school board members refuse to meet with citizens privately, based on state open meeting laws?
- For that matter, what constitutes a meeting?

These questions are answered by the provisions of most state open meeting or "sunshine" laws, which guarantee the public access to the proceedings of public bodies, including school boards. Because we could find no up-to-date compilation of state open meeting laws and no reference which focuses on their effect on the 15,000 local school boards in this country, NCCE decided to conduct its own survey. The factual information we collected from the 50 states and the District of Columbia during the summer of 1988 provides the basis of this handbook.

What is less easily measured are the following:

- the extent to which local school boards understand and comply with state open meeting laws
- the extent to which open meeting laws are open to interpretation
- the extent to which local school boards extend additional access to the public even when not required to do so by state law.

Evaluating the responsiveness of local school boards to their constituents is beyond the scope of our survey, though we did contact a number of community leaders and school board members to ask them about their experiences. Many of their impressions are threaded throughout our commentary. What we hope to provide is a tool with which local citizens and school boards can evaluate local performance. The anecdotal evidence strongly suggests that these groups will have their work cut out for them.

We know that a school board's interpretation of their rights and responsibilities under open meeting laws can lead to misunderstandings and extremes of behavior, ranging from the board which attempted to circumvent its state law by conferring regularly by telephone, to the board member who refused to discuss school-related issues either in person or by phone with any constituent for fear it would constitute an illegal "closed session." To answer questions not made clear by a summary of each law, we refer readers to a contact for more information in each state as well as a designated official to whom complaints should be addressed.

Citizens who feel current provisions for public access to local school board members and input at meetings are insufficient could possibly mount a campaign to amend the state open meeting law, but this could be a monumental task. We suggest an easier route: Negotiate with the local school board to let more sunshine in locally without legislative action. It's important to understand that state open meeting laws provide minimum standards of public access and do not prevent local policies which encourage or require more in the way of public involvement.

How the Survey Was Conducted

In early May 1988, we contacted the State Association of School Boards in each of the 50 states and the board of education in the District of Columbia, requesting that they reply to a two-page questionnaire about the provisions of their state's open meeting law as it applied to their member organizations--the local boards of education; subsequently, we asked them each to send a copy of their state's relevant law as well. At the same time, we asked each chief state school officer to supply us with up-to-date information on whom citizens should contact for more information or to file a complaint when they believed the law had been violated by their local boards. Once the results were in, we formatted the information from both sources, then sent our tabulations and interpretations back to the public information officer at each state department of education to insure that we had not misinterpreted any aspect of their law. We asked the PIOs for as much additional specific information as possible (e.g., where a survey response simply indicated that notice of meetings "is required," we wondered if there were precise regulations somewhere--24 hours in advance? printed in two local newspapers?). We also asked that they call to our attention any other documents, such as the state school code, which might affect the public's right to access school boards. As our cover letter stated, we assumed no reply implied our text was correct and complete as written.

Next we interviewed a sampling of present or past school board members from around the country to learn firsthand how those responsible for granting or denying citizens access to board meetings viewed the law, the philosophy behind it, and its effectiveness in practice. We agreed to keep our respondents anonymous in return for their candor.

This report represents the synthesis and analysis of that information, including fifty-one summaries of the open meeting laws as they apply to school boards in each state and in Washington, D.C., and two charts comparing key components of the law in every state. (See Appendix I and II). The variation in the length and style among summaries reflects the nature of the responses we received and variances in the statutes themselves. Appendix III lists resources we used, and includes a number of open meeting law pamphlets produced by individual states.

This report does not purport to be an intensive study into statutes and case law in every state. Nor are the synopses in Appendix I intended to be all inclusive. The "personnel" category in one state may cover only "matters adversely affecting a reputation," while in another everything from performance evaluation or the health of an employee, to allegations of criminal misconduct, are included. Again, most states offer provisions for emergency meetings, for the addition of last-minute items to the agenda, or for legal maneuvers known as "injunctions" or "writs of mandamus" which can restrain or force a board to act, but we have not attempted to go into such fine points. It may be necessary to check your state law for specifics. If, for instance, our chart indicates that citizens have the right to have notice of meetings mailed, you'll need to find out how far in advance to register for this service and whether a fee is attached.

Nor is this meant to be an anti-school board treatise. Indeed, there are many, many committed, responsive boards across the country, in which public access is stringently guarded by local policy despite the loopholes of state law. The National School Boards Association (NSBA) shares the concern that its units be responsive and responsible to the public they serve. In its publication Becoming a Better Board Member, the national organization advises, in order to "foster good public attitudes," citizens should "be made to feel a welcome part of the board meeting and the resulting decisions." To accomplish this, NSBA continues, boards should "go out of their way" to enlist community attendance and participation by extensive notification, attention to details of the convenience and efficacy of the meeting site, and an impressive list of other suggestions, from the assignment of a staff person to assist the media present to the distribution of a "Welcome to the Board Meeting" brochure.<sup>2</sup>

What this publication is meant to do, is to point out how each state law fares on major safeguards to citizens' rights, most notably the right to address the board in a meaningful way and to have access to, and input into, the board's decision-making process, with the hope that this knowledge will help strengthen citizen involvement in public education.

Our children deserve no less.

Chapter II

Open Meeting Laws: The Ideal and the Reality

As Common Cause founder John W. Gardner has noted, there are two reasons for the lack of public confidence in government: money and secrecy.<sup>3</sup> Open meeting laws are designed to attack the latter.

The purpose of open meeting laws is to guarantee that public bodies conduct their business in public. Sounds like a simple premise in a democratic society. But American government has taken a number of turns on the road from town meetings to thirty-second sound bites, and not all of them have worked to the common good. Backroom politics have long been a fact of life which is not limited to presidential caucuses; even groups as close to the heart of the community as the board of education have established the habit of gathering and voting in private ("This was not always intentional," says the NSBA, "the public just wasn't invited to attend").<sup>4</sup>

Whether called "open meeting," "open door," or "sunshine" laws, framed within the state Freedom of Information Act or tucked untitled within the state code, every state has legislation on its books to guarantee citizens the right at least to observe and at best participate in the democratic process. Like similarly-intended open records laws, (another important tool of public access to government which has crucial implications for citizen involvement in the public schools) these statutes apply to a great number of executive and legislative units on both the state and local levels.

All states guard citizens' rights to access their boards of education. But the extent of that effort varies widely; Alabama's entire law, for example, is contained in two paragraphs, the first establishing the sole ground for holding closed sessions and the second setting the penalty for violations; Connecticut's goes on for eight pages to include proper procedures for reconvened meetings, disruptions from the audience, and the recording, broadcasting and photographing of the event.

But a hefty word count does not guarantee a responsive statute. The most impressive preamble or statement of policy, declaring the intent of the legislature to ensure full participation of the citizens in the process of government, can be quickly short-circuited by a list of 15 or more subjects which are exempted from the open meeting rule. High-minded philosophy breaks down in practice when laws are laced with generalities like these: notice of meetings must be posted within a "reasonable" amount of time beforehand; minutes are due "as soon as practicable" afterwards, and closed meetings may be held for unspecified "exceptional circumstances." Some departures from succinct, easily understood English may be harmless quirks (you have to wonder why legislators in New Hampshire found it better to have minutes available within 144 hours rather than in six days); others invite suspicion that they are purposely convoluted, making it difficult for citizens to follow the procedures of--or to simply *understand--*the law.

In all, a number of factors we found common to many laws allow the system of open government to break down:

- vague requirements for compliance
- obtuse language
- too many exemptions from open meeting requirements
- complex procedures for citizen participation or redress

The terms of the laws also vary widely, starting with an understanding of what constitutes a meeting in the first place. Some statutes call a simple majority of the board a quorum and allow it to transact business legally; if a quorum is not present, it's not official. Others worry about the intention for which the members, however many of them, have gathered before determining whether or not a meeting is taking place.

Informal meetings can be particularly sticky. Should there be a protocol for a lunch attended only by board members the superintendent and key staff from the board of education? How about a conference call? If you're a board member in California, such an "electronic meeting" could get you in trouble, while in South Carolina you'd probably be all right as long as there was no intention to circumvent the "spirit" of the law. In Nevada and Oregon, on the other hand, such calls are legal as long as public notice requirements are met and the public has the opportunity to listen in--on a telephone speaker device, for example.

Should citizens worry about legal impropriety if three or four board members congregate at the punch bowl at a private holiday party? They might in Oklahoma where, when a majority of board members are together in an informal setting and the discussion turns to board business, the conversation comes under the auspices of the law. In the state of Washington, one board member complains, "We can't get more than three or four of our board members together for any reason without it being a meeting--we couldn't even get together to decide on a gift for the superintendent without an open session." Similarly, some board members have declined to meet with constituents to discuss board business on the grounds that such a conversation would violate the law, although we found no language in the statutes to support that interpretation.

Committees and subcommittees also pose interesting problems. Given the complex issues with which today's boards must deal, there are very useful and legitimate reasons for forming committees from time to time. But many statutes are not specific as to whether all committees are covered by the requirements of open meeting laws.

They should be; if board members (and others) gather to discuss and deal with official business, the meeting should be open.

The National Schools Boards Association takes a moderate approach to the issue. Says NSBA: "Many superintendents, board members, and school lawyers interpret the sunshine laws in their states to mean that informal social meetings are not prohibited by law, unless held deliberately to evade the law. They find it helpful to define meetings in terms of intent: 'Why are we getting together and does the law require that the public be involved or at least notified of what's happening?'"<sup>5</sup> That's basically the same rule of thumb that courts have used in deciding open meeting noncompliance cases, and in the best of all worlds, it would be adequate protection of the public interest.

But, alas, our universe is flawed. "Intent" is easily camouflaged and deserves intense scrutiny where open meeting law is concerned. The experience garnered by case-workers at the National Committee for Citizens in Education, whose toll-free help line responds to more than 400 calls a month from parents and students, reinforces the observation that there are many lapses from conscientious compliance, and enough loopholes and ambiguities in the state law to allow local jurisdictions to keep open meetings the exception rather than the rule. Boards have historically found ways to circumvent open meeting laws--through "serial" or "rotating" meetings, which consist of a number of conversations between or among a few board members at a time, such as a series of telephone calls by the chairperson to each member; by orchestrating "chance" meetings; by meeting at an inconvenient time or place or in a room that's too small to accommodate the public or is not handicapped-accessible; by holding retreats or dinner meetings which are technically open, but minimally announced and designed to make an observer feel awkward; or by charging the public a fee for access to public information, from the cost of photocopying minutes to the outrageous stipulation in the North Carolina statute that a fee of up to $25 may be charged each citizen who wants to attend a conference call meeting.

As one disillusioned board member from a central Texas city recalls, "Our board, like many others, had the habit of doing such things as holding regular meetings in a downtown administration building at 10:30 in the morning. Because the room was small, you had to have a ticket to get in. But the board would hand out all the tickets to staff people so that when parents arrived they were told, 'Sorry, you're too late. All the tickets are gone.'" And in one rural upstate New York district, board members consistently sat in a circle in the noisiest corner of the room, so that the discussion would be difficult for others to hear. In the middle of virtually every meeting, this group would go into executive session for an hour and a half or more. "It was a way of saying to the public, 'We really don't want you here.' Our board feels that our meetings should be for our convenience, to hell with the public," one former member admits.

The Elements of Open Meetings

School boards who want to follow the intent and spirit of their state open meeting law should be able to answer "yes" to the following questions:

1. Is the Public Given Adequate Advance Notice?--Putting the word out to the public before meetings is crucial. This is true whether the gathering is a "regular" meeting, which conforms to an official schedule and generally is set yearly; a "special" meeting, called as the need arises, or a "continued," "reconvened," or "adjourned" meeting. The purpose of an otherwise legally-conducted "open" meeting is defeated if no one knows it's being held, or if citizens must go to great lengths to ferret out the necessary information.

A strong mechanism needs to be in place to insure that all board members, too, are adequately informed. It would not serve the public interest to have a member whose views on a controversial issue differed from the majority left out of the debate because of inadequate or nonexistent notice of a special meeting.

2. Are the Agenda, Minutes and Other Documents Available for Public Review?--Only emergency meetings should be held without at least 72 hours public notice, which includes, at a minimum, the date, time and place, and a complete agenda, so that community members can decide whether it is a session they ought to attend and so that they have an opportunity to prepare to follow the discussion and to ask intelligent questions. The agenda should also be available to all present at the meeting, along with any other written information handed out to, or discussed by, board members at an open session. Detailed minutes must be available for public inspection afterwards--an official public record is as important to the spirit of conducting government business in the open as is the right of citizens to be present at the meeting itself.

In addition to the information necessary to understand the subject matter of a particular meeting, the agenda can provide interesting clues as to how serious a board is about being responsive to the community and about citizen involvement in the education process.

- Are people forced to sit through three hours of boiler plate business before the issue which brought them to the meeting is finally introduced?
- Is the wording of the document and the meaning of items listed comprehensible to the general public or is it filled with cryptic references and educational jargon?
- Is community involvement discouraged by the red tape or lengthy registration time necessary to get on the agenda in advance?
- Is community participation relegated to the end, when many have given up and gone home? Or is it scheduled at the beginning, or as a component of each item at the time it's taken up by the board? For that matter, is it scheduled at all?

3. Do Citizens Have the Right to Attend and Speak at School Board Meetings?--Two absolutely fundamental rights of citizens are (or should be) at the heart of open meeting laws: the right of the public to hear and observe the decision-making process, and the right to be heard. In the vast majority of these statutes, public access means citizens may observe but not necessarily speak. But no state law denies local government units the power to adopt bylaws and other policies which invite and encourage citizen participation, including submitting written testimony, requesting that an item be placed on the agenda, and being accorded timely follow-up on questions the board can't answer on the spot, as well as addressing the board in person. Those rights should be granted at every open session of every school board in the country. If your state opening meeting law does not require it, work at the local level to change the policy.

4. Are Closed Sessions Strictly Limited?--As important as being heard is being able to hear, not just the final motions, but all aspects of debates, the give-and-take, by which the board makes decisions affecting the community's public education. Of all the potential escape hatches from such open proceedings, the most insidious is the "closed" or "executive" session, during which the board is allowed to shut out the public while it discusses (and in a few instances, votes) on official business.

Some very specific situations justify such a conversation: (a) a discussion of an individual student or employee whose reputation is at stake or (b) an exchange of information that would prejudice the outcome of an ongoing transaction (real estate, contractual or pending litigation).

A balance should be maintained between the right to privacy and the public's right to know. Board members cite several circumstances in which they feel undue harm has been caused by public discussions--when some of the questions which should be asked in an interview with a potential superintendent may disqualify him or her for the job, but will also cause embarrassment to the applicant's family, or when student discipline cases are reported, including the student's name, in the local press, for example. But some public officials feel even these commonly used criteria for closed session are sometimes unwarranted. As the California Attorney General's office notes, "The fact that material may be sensitive, embarrassing or controversial does not justify application of a closed session unless it is authorized by some specific exception. Rather, in most circumstances these characteristics are further evidence of the need for public scrutiny and participation in discussing such matters."<sup>6</sup>

5. Are All Votes Taken in Public?--No votes, not even "straw polls" should be taken in executive sessions. Closed meetings should not be used for board consensus-building, so that votes taken in open session become merely pro forma, effectively denying the public the right to know individual board member's opinions and justifications for their positions. When boards simply vote unanimously in open session to confirm actions taken in closed session without any further explanation to the public, or meet privately with the superintendent to iron out any rough spots which might otherwise appear on the public agenda--"so no unfortunate surprises surface at the (public) meeting," as one administrator put it,<sup>7</sup> --"representative democracy" becomes a sham.

There are no more than three or four worthy grounds for executive sessions (although some states list several times that many), and they must be strictly interpreted. Otherwise, almost any agenda item could end up in a backroom; boards have decided in secret to oppose the county executive's education budget, for instance, on the disingenuous grounds that they were dealing with personnel and labor negotiations.

Why School Board Members May Resist Open Deliberation

Strict interpretation of open meeting laws is not always popular with school district officials. Twenty percent of board chairpeople who responded to a 1986 survey conducted by the Institute for Educational Leadership said that sunshine laws interfered with their work,<sup>8</sup> and anecdotal evidence of board members' qualms abounds. "A while back," says one board member who prefers more privacy, "while we were negotiating a contract in executive session, one board member stomped out of the room. Can you imagine how that would have looked if it had occurred in open session? There should be straw votes," he contends, "and any differences should be worked out in executive session, and the board should keep taking straw votes until, like a jury, they reach a consensus. When the executive session ends, the final vote should be taken in open session, and it should be unanimous. If you want to keep the public, and the school district employees, feeling comfortable and working cooperatively with everyone on the board, they should not know who voted which way originally. That would be counterproductive and would send the wrong message."

That attitude is often well-intentioned; some board members who earn straight A's on every other aspect of community involvement nevertheless support the wide use of executive sessions. But it can also violate the law in spirit, if not letter--take the case of Prince George's County, Maryland (a state which allows 14 grounds for closed meetings), where the board met in executive session at least 43 times in one eight-month period, for example.<sup>9</sup>

"School board members, like politicians, don't like to look stupid, and you can do so real easily asking Dick and Jane questions that in fact need to be asked about a complicated issue," asserts a board member from a bedroom community in a Northwestern high-tech corridor. "There's the one pressure not to look stupid, and an opposing pressure not to expose your whole research process to public scrutiny, or to give the public information which is better kept confidential, and still make a wise decision. So we ask the questions and do the research outside of the official setting by calling each other or the superintendent, getting together with the superintendent privately, and so forth."

Says one seven-year veteran of a mid-Atlantic city board, "It is simply a matter of fact that people don't really feel able to have forthright discussions in a public forum. It's more difficult to take positions that might be risky or to ask the kinds of questions or do the kind of brainstorming that lead to good discussions because--and I know this from personal experience--they can be misunderstood. If the press, for example, misunderstands or misquotes, it can create real problems."

An understandable ambivalence confronts these local policy-makers. "How I feel as a board member is not necessarily the same as I feel as a citizen. As a board member, I wish we could thrash many things out in private. In public, when things like the pros and cons of a bussing plan end up in the newspaper, that really doesn't help the district. From some board members' perspective, it's helpful (some say imperative) to be able to present a united front, but I can see that that's not useful for the public's purposes," a trustee of a West Coast urban board explains.

Adds a colleague from rural New Jersey: "I understand the importance of the intent of open meeting laws, and why they're considered necessary. But from a board member's point of view, we'd be better off without them. They decrease efficiency and make it more difficult to do our job. You just can't have the same kind of give-and-take in an open meeting. As a board, you're better off if you can talk about matters privately and project a united front to the public." Her board goes into executive session "after just about every (public) meeting."

Adding to the confusion is some curious advice from the NSBA. "Some boards generally move into executive session at the time of a regular board meeting. This almost always arouses suspicions in the minds of the citizens present, so many boards find it wise to state why they are going into closed session, and that this action is consistent with the law," the national group advises its members. "A better approach might be to hold executive sessions prior to the regular public meeting."<sup>10</sup> A better approach for school officials maybe, but not for the public's right to know--and illegal in many states. A number of state open meeting laws specify that executive sessions must be held at the time of regular meeting in order to alert the public to them. A closed meeting is allowed only if the board votes publicly to hold such a session.

Open Meeting Laws Are Not Enforced

Whatever doubts the public may have about the conduct of boards of education has not been shared widely by the judiciary. Most statutes include provisions for citizens to institute some kind of legal action against a board which violates the law, by filing for an injunction or writ of mandamus, bringing suit to have the illegal actions declared null and void, and in some cases, by bringing civil and/or criminal charges against the board or individual members or levying fines (between $25 and $2,000). But "soft enforcement" of the law (a verbal slap on the wrist) has often been the rule. Judges are understandably loathe to order a new bus garage torn down because the vote on its construction was not properly conducted, for example (timeliness in uncovering and dealing with violations is of the essence). But cases may be dismissed with a ruling of "harmless failure to comply," an approach abetted in most states by a "knowing and willful" clause in the law: An official is not judged responsible if he or she convincingly claims not to have realized the law was being violated (except in Iowa, where "ignorance of (the) law shall be no defense," and, by implication, in Massachusetts and Arkansas where each board member is officially issued a personal copy of the law upon election or appointment to office.)

As a result, asserts Maryland state Sen. Howard A. Denis, "a statute intended to guarantee openness in government has instead become a justification for keeping the public in the dark. The law has been turned on its head...The statute has become a closed meetings law."<sup>11</sup>

Chapter III

Results and Conclusions

As we stated earlier, public deliberation is not only required of local school boards by law, it can be a very helpful way to have the entire community share in educational accountability.

With openness serving their long term best interests, do school boards typically welcome citizens into the decision making process? Seldom. Furthermore, the minimum standards set by many state open meeting laws do not facilitate public participation as they should. Our assessment of state laws found these dismaying patterns of weakness.

❑ Only 18 state open meeting or equivalent laws expressly provide citizens with substantial reasonable notification of meetings; the deadlines range from a full week beforehand in one case to a meager 24 hours in 10 others (although many more states do call for an unspecified advance notification to the public of open meetings, and others mandate at least that a schedule of regular meetings be filed annually and made available to the public).

❑ Twenty-three states call for the agenda to be available in advance, although it's a wishy-washy commitment in many cases; in Vermont, for example, it need not be made public, but must be produced on request. The statutes do better in requiring that minutes be kept.

❑ Forty-three states instruct boards to make the record of open sessions available to the public, and ❑ Eighteen specify that they be kept for executive sessions as well.

❑ But even in meetings declared open, only 14 state sunshine laws explicitly provide for public participation in the process of educating our children.

❑ All states allow for executive sessions, most usually for personnel decisions (46 states and the District of Columbia allow this exemption for at least one subcategory, such as the protection of an individual's reputation. Many are much more inclusive). Forty-four states and D.C. exempt various aspects of the attorney-client privilege, most often when the discussion involves pending or probable litigation; deliberations leading to real property transactions are protected in 39 of the jurisdictions; and negotiations with employee organizations or labor relations may be closed sessions in forty-one. Significantly, only 24 of these laws specifically exempt matters relating to the discipline (usually the suspension or expulsion) of an individual student, although such matters might well be included tacitly under "personnel," or addressed in another piece of legislation. Other popular grounds for public exclusion include a catch-all "matters required to be kept confidential by law"; discussions of safety personnel and devices; matters adversely affecting the finances of the board or the investing of public funds; and placement and/or competency of an individual student.

□ Forty-five of these laws indicate that actions taken in violation of their provisions may be null and void or invalid. And one (Missouri) contains whistle-blower protection; no person in the Show Me state can be held civilly liable for filing a "good faith" report of violation of the law, and no employee of the governmental agency involved can be in any way disciplined for doing so. The number of exemptions ranges from one to 11--some states have several more on the books, but they were omitted from our study because they seemed to have no bearing on public school boards. The most common number of board-related exemptions is six. We conclude much too much of the public's business is still being done in the dark.

Standards for Public Access to Local School Boards

Based on the results of our survey, NCCE has concluded that no state has an open meeting law which can be held up as an ideal instrument for protecting public access to local school boards. But this doesn't mean there aren't plenty of individual districts that have taken the initiative to create their own full, responsive policies similar to the one which follows. By combining the best elements of many of the laws, and infusing that list with the safeguards indicated by our research, we believe this is a format through which every school board nationwide can ensure the potential participation of its entire community.

Meetings Open to the Public: Any assemblage of members of the school board or its officially designated committees or subcommittees are open to the public as are work sessions, superintendent's information sessions, and any other such gatherings, if called to discuss, be informed of, or act on board business, with very limited and specifically delineated exceptions.

Electronic meetings must adhere to all the requirements of in-person open meetings, with proper notice including locations where, and means by which, the public may listen to and address the meeting, and proper minutes must be kept. Each speaker, whether a member of the board, the superintendent, school staff, or public, must identify him/herself and all votes must be taken by roll call.

Scheduling and Public Notice: All regular meetings are set annually. The schedule is on file for public inspection and announced in a local newspaper with general circulation. A second written notice must be given at least 72 hours to one week in advance of the meeting, appearing in at least one local newspaper with general circulation, and posted conspicuously for the public at the board's principal office or the site of the meeting (if they are different locations), the local public library, and in a public area of each school building. This notice is to include at least the time, date, place, and agenda of the meeting. The wording must be understandable to all segments of the public that might logically be expected to have an interest, or a stake, in local school board activity. Any addition made to the agenda after its posting must be announced at the scheduled meeting with an explanation of why it could not be foreseen in time for inclusion in the public announcement.

Notice of all meetings should be mailed to each citizen who requests it and should include the agenda, date, time and place of the meeting. Both the agenda and any public reports relevant to it should be available to citizens attending the board meeting. A fee may be charged to cover reproduction and mailing costs.

Time and Location: Meetings must be held at times and places convenient to the majority of the public who can reasonably be expected to have interest in board decisions. Access to meeting space should be barrier-free for the handicapped and signing interpreters should be available upon request for the hearing impaired.

Citizen Participation: Time must be reserved for citizen participation at the beginning and end of every public school board meeting. Citizens may ask questions related to agenda items without registering beforehand to speak. Citizens wishing to testify on an issue before the board may be asked to register 15 minutes before the meeting begins. The board chair may set reasonable time limits for each speaker. In the event that many citizens have testimony on a single issue, a public hearing will be scheduled.

Minutes: Detailed minutes of all public meetings, including committees and subcommittees, should be made available to be read and photocopied within 15 days of the meeting. Unapproved minutes should be so marked. Minutes should include at least the date, time and place of the meeting; the members of the board recorded as either present or absent; the substance of all issues deliberated; a record by individual member of all votes cast; descriptions of action taken or legal action addressed; the names of any persons who address the board and a brief description of the subject addressed. Minutes must also include any other information that any board member requests be included or reflected.

Abbreviated minutes of executive sessions, including the date, time and place, board members recorded as present or absent, and description of the sanctioned reason for a closed session, must be available for public inspection within 15 days. Detailed minutes of an executive session must be kept, though they may be withheld from public inspection as long as their publication would defeat the lawful purpose of the closed session, unless ordered unsealed by a court of law.

Closed or "executive" sessions: Those which are permitted should be held only after a formal motion is made followed by a recorded vote of two-thirds of the board membership, taken at an open session for which advance notice was given, and the reason for the executive session is clearly explained at the public session and is part of the public record. No votes or straw polls can be taken, and no effort to form a consensus will be tolerated. Any citizen in attendance at the open meeting may challenge the grounds set out by the board for the closed session, and have the right to a full response from the board. Topics permitted to be discussed in executive session are strictly limited to

- ✓ Personnel matters affecting a particular individual employee (hiring, job performance, health, discipline, promotion, demotion, dismissal or to hear charges against an employee) but only when the good name or reputation of an individual could clearly be impugned--Employee may request an open hearing.
- ✓ The purchase, sale or lease of real property, but only when the specific discussion, if public, would significantly affect the value of the property.
- ✓ Pending litigation in which the board is plaintiff or defendant, but only when the specific conversation, if public, would prejudice the outcome of the case.
- ✓ Student discipline--Student or student's official representative may request either a closed or an open meeting.

Public Attendance: No one has to register or identify him/herself in any way as a precondition of attending an open meeting. Any questionnaires, sign-up sheet, polls, etc. which are presented before, during, or after the meeting must be strictly and clearly voluntary. The public may record, photograph, or broadcast open meetings as long as the proceedings are not disrupted.

Voting: All votes must be taken in open session in a manner which makes clear to the public (a)the subject matter being decided, and (b)how each member voted (by show of hands or by voice vote, for example) and all votes must be recorded as to how each member voted.

Penalty for Violations: Actions taken in violation of the act are voidable by a court. Suit should be commenced within three months of the action or within three months of public disclosure of the violation. If the suit is upheld, court costs and reasonable attorney's fees will be paid by the board of education. However, if a suit against the board is found to be frivolous, then the plaintiff may be responsible for court costs and reasonable attorney's fees incurred by the board. Civil penalties of not less than $50 will be levied against board members found to have violated the law.

Increasing Public Access

All states should subscribe to the principle that the proceedings and actions of all governing boards, committees, agencies, etc. be open to public access and observance. Some state statutes include more detailed provisions to assure that school boards meet in the sunshine -- these states give school board members, parents, and citizens a legal basis or standard for school board accessibility in their community. In states where the statutory provisions are vague and/or do not address some of the major ingredients of an effective open meeting policy, much can be done at the local level to ensure citizen accessibility to the local school board.

What Parents and Other Citizens Can Do

In this publication we have identified the elements of a strong and effective local policy on open meeting laws. Amending state law to improve the provisions of the open meeting act can be a difficult and time-consuming task. A more direct and effective strategy for change may be to examine local school board policy and practice,

- (1) to determine if state law is being followed,
- (2) to identify those standards, criteria, or procedures which are not addressed in state law or local policy, and
- (3) to propose ordinances, resolutions, rules, or regulations to improve the accessibility of the school board's deliberations and actions.

More people must become aware that open meeting laws exist. We encourage individual parents and parent/community groups to use the information in this publication to become informed about the specific provisions of their state's open meeting law. The next step is to become familiar with any local policies related to open and closed meetings. With this information, such groups will be prepared to monitor local school board practices to determine if state and local requirements are being followed, and, possibly, to serve as a communications link between the school board and the community (perhaps preparing a handbook to provide parents and citizens with more information about open meeting laws).

We suggest that parents regularly attend school board meetings--the presence of an audience is one of the best safeguards for upholding the law. Observe the policies and practices of the local board. Determine whether they are following the state requirements for public notice, the right of the public to speak, procedures for executive sessions, availability and completeness of minutes, etc. If discrepancies between state law and local practices are discovered, establish a written record of each abuse, along with an account of all efforts to resolve the problems, and of the school district responses.

It's important to communicate with each board member in person or in writing about all concerns--and to remain undaunted (and unruffled) in the face of any vague or evasive replies. The board should be informed that its meetings will be monitored and any noncompliance will be recorded. The local newspaper may be a powerful ally--make sure its editors are aware of the problem and urge them to involve their publication in the solution.

The standards recommended in this report can be used to evaluate the practices of the local school board and to propose changes in local policy which will increase public access to the decision-making process. It will require a long-term effort to inform the public effectively about open meeting laws and/or to bring about changes in local policies and practices, but parents and other citizens must voice their concerns and be consistent and persistent in pressing them.

One area most often neglected by state law, as has been noted, is the right of citizens to speak at all school board meetings and on all issues placed before the board. Many local boards have adopted procedures which facilitate public participation, even when the state law does not require such a policy. Those which do not, and instead continue to conduct their business with no opportunity for citizen comment on all issues, should be met with concerted public pressure to change their ways.

If the incumbent school board members continue to keep the community disinvolved, parents and others have more formidable options to pursue. Through the electoral process they may, in most instances, both change the membership of the board and make the open meeting law a campaign issue. As a last recourse, it should be noted that legal procedures exist in about half the states to enable dissatisfied communities to replace their board members through a recall petition.

Legal action is another option: Most state laws provide a mechanism through which citizens can file a formal complaint with the appropriate local or state agency. However, parents should not automatically expect prompt action against local boards following the filing of a complaint. Enforcement of the open meeting laws does not appear to be a high priority with most state officials. They may simply inform the local board of the complaint and expect the board members to comply with the law. Or they may look the other way, or suggest that citizens take the matter up at the board level and bring suit privately if they are not satisfied.

In that case, it would not be unreasonable to contact a state representative or senator who could bring political pressure on the attorney general's office to take action.

It may well be necessary to make many contacts and try many strategies to bring about compliance with the law or changes in policies and practices. The "Whom to Contact" section on each state page in Appendix I, listing state or local officials who can advise citizens on their rights and on how and where to submit a grievance, is a good place to start. If these contacts are not helpful, the state school boards associations (listed in Appendix III) might provide useful information and assistance.

What School Boards Can Do

When new members are elected to school boards, they should be fully informed about the state laws and local policies they are legally bound to follow, including open meeting laws. Citizen groups, if necessary, should see to it that this is done, and school board members should realize too, that they have the power to adopt policies and practices which will increase the accessibility of the public to their deliberations and actions.

The handbook entitled Becoming a Better Board Member, published by the National School Boards Association, lists the following suggestions to increase public participation and support:

- Do more than list the meeting schedule in the local newspaper. Place notices at other public buildings, put meeting notices in school newsletters, and make announcements at related public meetings.
- Make it convenient for citizens to attend, by scheduling meetings at an accessible place and a convenient time.
- Provide ample parking and comfortable seating.
- Arrange the agenda to let citizens speak early in the meeting.
- Place copies of the agenda near the doors where people can pick them up as they arrive.
- Prepare a brochure explaining the board's responsibilities, policies, and procedures, and how members of the public can express their views.
- Appoint citizens to serve on advisory committees to study, research and report on specific school problems under consideration.<sup>12</sup>

If the state has published a booklet about open meeting laws, the local school board might obtain a large quantity to distribute to parents and citizens. If none exists, they might form a citizens committee to prepare and print such a publication, which could include information on state law and on local policy.

Closing Remarks

As we continue to insist on education reform into the last decade of the twentieth century, it would be naive to think we could stop with classroom technique, better disciplined students or even school building accountability. Perhaps first and foremost, school boards and top local school administrators must answer to the public. Effective implementation of recent public education improvement initiatives rests directly with school boards, local educators and the local communities they represent. We hope this publication will serve the best interests of both the public and the school boards who attend to the needs of its children.

Glossary

ELECTRONIC MEETING: A meeting at which all members of the organization are not together physically, but are able to communicate with each other so that each member can interact with all other members at any time, by such means as teleconferencing or conference phone call facilities.

EXECUTIVE SESSION: A meeting of a public body from which the general public is excluded. Such meetings may only be held legally in certain specifically delineated circumstances, when the sensitivity of the discussion is judged by law to outweigh the public's right to know the content of the discussion.

INJUNCTION: A court order barring a person or entity from taking or continuing to take certain actions.

OPEN MEETINGS LAW: Legislation currently effective in all 50 states guaranteeing the public's right to be notified of, to attend, and in some cases to participate in most meetings of government bodies.

OPEN RECORDS LAW: Companion legislation to the open meetings laws in each state, open records laws guarantee the public's right to access most documents and records of public bodies.

PLAINTIFF: The person who initiates a civil law suit against another person or entity.

PRO FORMA VOTE: A vote taken simply to comply with a legal requirement, such as that taken with no discussion of the issue in open session, after a school board has in fact deliberated and reached consensus in executive session.

QUORUM: The minimum number of members of an organization who must participate in a meeting in order for official business to be transacted legally; often, a simple majority of all members meeting in person or by electronic means.

RECONVENED, CONTINUED, OR ADJOURNED MEETING: A meeting which is called to finish the business on the agenda of a previously scheduled meeting.

REGULAR MEETING: A meeting for which the time and place is usually scheduled annually in the organization's bylaws or other official documents and/or is on file with the local governmental jurisdiction, and at which the normal business of the agency or organization is transacted.

SERIAL, OR ROTATING, MEETING: A number of interchanges between various members of an agency or organization, such as a succession of phone calls between a board chairperson and board members, in which opinions and information about official business are exchanged or decisions made. Serial meetings are sometimes used to circumvent open meeting laws.

SPECIAL MEETING: Any meeting of a public body other than a regular or emergency meeting, including adjourned, reconvened or continued meetings.

STRAW POLL (OR STRAW VOTE): An unofficial poll or vote taken to assess the degree of consensus on, or the general inclination for or against a candidate or an issue.

SUNSHINE LAW: Legislation designed to assure that government bodies conduct public business in public view (see open meetings law and open records law).

WHISTLE-BLOWER: One who alerts authorities or the public to official wrongdoing, such as a school district employee who "blows the whistle" on a board's systematic misuse of executive sessions.

WRIT OF MANDAMUS: a court order demanding that an official carry out certain aspects of his/her official duty.

- * Labor negotiations
- * Pending litigation
- * Security
- * Student discipline, except expulsion (student may request public hearing). Student must be notified in advance and final action of the board must be taken in open session

Action Permitted:

- * Board must report at public meeting during which closed session was held or at its next public meeting, any action taken, and any roll call vote taken to appoint, employ or dismiss an employee
- * No final action regarding student discipline may be taken in closed session

Penalty For Board Noncompliance:

- * Action taken in violation may be null and void
- * Failure to post an agenda item may void any action on the item
- * Attorney's fees may be awarded to the successful party

Additional Comments:

- * Video teleconferences authorized for limited purposes
- * Serial meetings are prohibited
- * Public has right to tape record meetings
- * Agendas or any other writings other than confidential documents distributed to all or a majority of board for discussion or consideration at a public meeting must be made available to the public
- * Public need not register or provide any information as a condition of attendance at open meeting

What others are saying about
Open Meeting Laws, Local School
Boards and the NCCE Survey:

"The open meeting or sunshine law is my candidate for the most violated law outside of jaywalking."

Dennis Sweeney

Maryland Deputy Attorney General

"Citizens, the best message you can give a school board is to show up at the meetings. It doesn't matter if you ever say anything, just be there. Your presence is one of the best safeguards for upholding the law."

Robert J. Freeman

Executive Director, Committee on Open Government, New York State

"Once more NCCE has really done a great service and done it well. Would that even some of the model policies were in place in every school district. Your state comparisons and recommendations ought to serve as catalysts for every group serious about making public and parent involvement both active and actual."

Manya S. Ungar

President, National FTA, 1987-89
