

ED358487 1993-00-00 Teaching Minority Students To Write Effectively. ERIC Digest.

ERIC Development Team

www.eric.ed.gov

Table of Contents

If you're viewing this document online, you can click any of the topics below to link directly to that section.

Teaching Minority Students To Write Effectively. ERIC Digest.....	1
REFERENCES.....	6

ERIC Identifier: ED358487

Publication Date: 1993-00-00

Author: Estrin, Herman A.

Source: ERIC Clearinghouse on Reading English and Communication Bloomington IN.

Teaching Minority Students To Write Effectively. ERIC Digest.

THIS DIGEST WAS CREATED BY ERIC, THE EDUCATIONAL RESOURCES INFORMATION CENTER. FOR MORE INFORMATION ABOUT ERIC, CONTACT ACCESS ERIC 1-800-LET-ERIC

Today, many beginning students in urban public colleges and technical schools are members of minority groups. Such is the case at New Jersey Institute of Technology, where I taught. To teach these high school graduates (many of whom have had very little writing practice) how to write a composition effectively, we had to dispel their fear of writing, give them something to write about to encourage them to write with success, and instill in each student self-confidence, dignity, and a sense of self-worth.

To accomplish these goals, the following six-step approach was used:

1. Instruct students how to write a composition by:

--a. Choosing an appropriate subject and limiting it.

--b. Considering the purpose of writing.

--c. Writing a central idea of the composition.

--d. Developing a working plan or an outline before writing the composition.

--e. Using the outline as a tool in writing.

2. Help students select relevant topics in writing a composition.

Students often complain: "What can I write about?" "How can I write 500 words on that subject?" "How can I quote from the literature which I want to write about?"

To help solve these problems, the students I taught (most of whom were Black) were encouraged to use the anthology "Black Culture: Reading and Writing Black," edited by Glorina M. Simmons and Helene D. Hutchinson (Holt, Rinehart, and Winston). This text caught the students' interests immediately because of its timely topics, provocative selections, and realistic illustrations. Contents include:

* The beauty of Black;

* On Blackness, things Black, and beautiful; Black woman, Black Man, and language of soul;

* Jive, Black power is Black language;

* Language and revolution;

* Self-hate;

* Rage;

* The why of violence;

* Ideology;

* Separation, integration, violence;

* Black heritage;

* Songs of the beloved homeland;

* Stolen heritage.

3. Encourage students to write with effectiveness and with success.

To accomplish this goal, students worked on a theme-writing assignment based on the readings in Black Culture. In a two-hour session, students reacted orally to the readings. Some gave oral interpretations of the poetry or prose selections. Others participated in the pros and cons of the thesis of each selection. Enthusiasm, fervor, and interest permeated the discussions.

To give students the "sweet smell of success" in writing their compositions, remember that students are not professional writers. Avoid undue harsh criticism and caustic remarks. Some students have admitted that writing was a painful experience for them because throughout their secondary school careers, they received mainly unfavorable criticism on their papers.

Look for positive aspects in ideas and writing approaches while, at the same time, comment, raise questions, stimulate the student to further thought, recommend a relevant text or article, and make suggestions to help students revise their compositions. A brief word of praise helps reward each student for the labor of writing.

4. Use class discussion of papers to improve writing techniques.

In class discussions, comment on the students' themes but provide anonymity to the writer. This encourages an atmosphere of respect and acceptance of students' opinions, values, and ideas. From the corrected "batch" of compositions, teach style, vocabulary, grammar, punctuation, organization, and sentence structure (Delpit, 1987; Spikes & Spikes, 1983). When the students see the words, sentences, and the paragraphs which they and their peers have written, the study of how to rephrase becomes a more meaningful experience in both language and composition.

5. Have students revise their papers in keeping with the suggestions made by the instructor and other students.

Emphasize that a well-written paper has to be revised several times and that to have a well-written paper, one must proofread for misspelling and for punctuation and grammatical errors. In addition, stress that when a writer is revising and rewriting, a maturation in writing can be seen. In this process the student learns to rearrange words and sentences, eliminate redundancies, subordinate sentences and clauses, obtain a variety of sentences, and use transitional devices (Fox, 1992).

6. Instill self-confidence and present a knowledge of the self-identity of each student and a dignity of the worth of each student's personality. Frisk (1989) reiterates the importance of this tenet.

Many students in class discussions stated that they found it difficult to identify themselves and to discover their worth as a personality. Some indicated that in a few of their high-school classes they were "talked down to by peers," were made to feel that they were doomed to failure, and believed that they had no academic skill or talent. After having read and discussed the text, one student wrote:

"It (the book) helps attain the desire to say that you are proud of being a Black person, a desire to say that you are someone valuable to the society, and the desire to say that you are someone--someone who cares, shares, feels, thinks, talks, and handles himself like a true person should--with dignity and pride. The book is a practical experience because you learn to experience the different emotions that the book contains, such as fear, hate, love, pride, courage, and an entire mixture of emotions shared by a mistreated society for a hundred years. This itself is Black culture, an assortment of emotions and values that the Black man must read to be a person to whom everyone can look up. When you say, 'I am proud 'cause I'm Black,' then you are truly a Black person in the best of all possible ways--in soul and in heart."

Another student wrote:

"Black is a beautiful color. Barbara McBrain makes this fact very clear in her poem 'What Color Is Black.' She makes me realize that there is something special and unique about being Black. Listening and reading all the bad things about being Black is what I have been exposed to all of my life. But now to read some of the good things about being Black has embedded in this person a sense of pride--yes, pride in knowing that I am somebody and that my color is beautiful."

This approach to the teaching of composition:

* dispelled the students' fear of writing a composition;

* taught them the techniques of writing, proofreading, and revising their compositions;

* increased their awareness of what to write;

* encouraged students to write with effectiveness and success;

* gave individualized attention to each student's composition;

* enlivened the class periods with discussions about style, grammar, usage, organization, sentence structure, punctuation, and vocabulary;

* instilled self-confidence in each student so that the student approached writing assignments with a positive attitude.

Note these selections written by students:

"...The ways of life are of old and new; yet each is very interrelated. The fact that in both eras the Black man survived, and yet made his surroundings pleasant, seems in itself a feat. The Black man made his environment something for himself. The old way of life was to be the beginning of the emerging of a new society that will always have a unity with itself and with the Black man. To read the poems and silently think of the deep meaning give one a sense of desire to relate to the book and to other people."

A non-Black wrote this opinion of the text: "For 300 years, the ritual and artistic freedom of Blacks has been covered by the cloud of racial discrimination and misunderstanding between the whites and the Blacks...It is amazing to learn of the great number of Black writers in this contemporary era, such as Langston Hughes, W.E.B. DuBois, LeRoy Jones, Eldridge Cleaver, and Henry Simmons. These writers are picking momentum and audacity and lean towards a new kind of revolution, a revolution that speaks of Black image, of Black rhythm, of Black bravery, and of Black compassion. Another important factor concerning these writers is that they effectively give the reader a taste of the real power of Black language."

Herman A. Estrin is a professor emeritus of English at New Jersey Institute of Technology and founder/director of the N.J. Writers Conference and N.J. Poetry Contest. He received the NJEA Distinguished Service to Education Award in 1986.

REFERENCES

"A Conversation with Lisa Delpit" (1991). Language Arts, v68 n7 p541-47. [EJ 434 262]
Delpit, Lisa D. (1987). "Skills and Other Dilemmas of a Progressive Black Educator." Equity and Choice, v3 n2 p9-14. [EJ 355 128]

Fox, Thomas (1992). "Repositioning the Profession: Teaching Writing to African American Students." Journal of Advanced Composition, v12 p291-303. [EJ 447 097]

Frisk, Philip (1989). "Black English and the Henry Higgins Project: Avoiding Disempowering Intervention into 'Black English'." Paper presented at the Conference on College Composition and Communication, Seattle, WA. [ED 348 673]

Gourdine, Angeletta K. M. (1991). "Exploring the Rhetoric of Resistance." Writing Instructor, v10 n3 p136-42. [EJ 355 574]

Spikes, W. Curtis and Lerah A. Spikes (1983). "Development of a College Curriculum to Enhance Essay Writing Skills at a Predominantly Black College." Journal of Negro Education, v53 n2 p110-17. [EJ 282 241]

This publication was prepared with funding from the Office of Educational Research and Improvement, U.S. Department of Education, under contract no. RR93002011. Contractors undertaking such projects under government sponsorship are encouraged to express freely their judgment in professional and technical matters. Points of view or opinions, however, do not necessarily represent the official view or opinions of the Office of Educational Research and Improvement.

Title: Teaching Minority Students To Write Effectively. ERIC Digest.

Document Type: Information Analyses---ERIC Information Analysis Products (IAPs) (071); Information Analyses---ERIC Digests (Selected) in Full Text (073);

Available From: ERIC Clearinghouse on Reading, England, and Communication, Indiana University, 2805 E. 10th St., Suite 150, Bloomington, IN 47408-2698.

Descriptors: Cultural Differences, Minority Groups, Postsecondary Education, Self Concept, Self Esteem, Student Needs, Writing Instruction, Writing Processes, Writing Skills

Identifiers: ERIC Digests, Writing Development

###

[\[Return to ERIC Digest Search Page\]](#)