ABSTRACT

Accompanying a collection of 85 books for teenagers donated to local service organizations in Indiana, or donated in the name of such an organization to local libraries, this pamphlet offers suggestions to help the organizations engage adolescents with books and lists the paperback books given to the organizations. Suggestions in the pamphlet include: promoting reading with posters; using older children to encourage younger children to read; reading aloud to others; giving book talks: holding "read-ins"; and providing a storyteller. A "Reading bill of Rights" concludes the pamphlet. The list of books is divided into sections of adventure/fantasy, biography, mystery/horror/science fiction, realistic fiction, short stories, and sports. (RS)

SUGGESTIONS TO HELP ENGAGE YOUNG ADOLESCENTS

WITH BOOKS

Overview

The Middle Grades Reading Network in Indiana is an organization of professional reading specialists, interested educators, and concerned citizens that has been funded by the Eli Lilly Foundation to motivate adolescents to read.

One of its activities is the donation of appropriate book collections to Indiana service organizations—so far over 1500 such organizations have received these books. The pamphlet that follows is sent along with the book collection.

Suggestions to Help Engage Young Adolescents With Books

Congratulations! You have been chosen to receive a set of young adolescent books selected by Hoosier librarians and teachers who are knowledgeable about books at this level. The collection will help you encourage reading among your young people.

Indiana's record of S.A.T. scores and college attendance is low when compared to other states. And the main reason that students drop out of school is not drug usage, crime, or pregnancy: the main reason is that students cannot do the academic work.

According to the Center for the Study of Reading at the University of Illinois, 30 percent of our vocabulary is acquired through voluntary reading. In other words, the more you read, the better you are in reading.

Here is an example illustrating the decline of voluntary reading among our young people. Each year students have an opportunity to read from a list of twenty Young Hoosier Book Award Program books at each of three levels--primary, grades 4-6, and grades 6-8—and vote for their favorites. You would think that the votes cast would be nearly equal in number, inasmuch as there are about the same number of students at each level, but the voting in 1993 was as follows: primary children cast 40,037 votes, grades 4-6 children cast 15,778 votes, and grades 6-8 students cast 3,159 votes.

The young people in your program may not have access to new and interesting books in the same way that they are surrounded with television and other forms of interesting, but not necessarily helpful, media. This collection gives you an opportunity to provide a fortunate introduction to the realm of books for the youth that you serve.

The following are some suggestions that may assist you in this important work.

Place the books in an area that is accessible to the youth that you serve.

While the books need to be accessible, people who use the books may need to be reminded to return them for others to use.

Commercial posters that promote reading are available from the American Library Association and other sources. A poster contest can be held with prizes ranging from paperback books to coupons for French fries.

Older youths can be excellent reading role models for younger children. As the older children figure out ways to help market books, they have an opportunity to sell themselves on books.

You will especially like some of the books, and those books will be easy for you to promote.

Young adolescents enjoy being read to, and they will benefit from your reading aloud, provided that you are enthusiastic about the book and that conditions are such that there is a good setting for the young people to listen as you read.

You can promote a book without reading the entire book by telling about the setting, describing the characters, etc. The idea is to sell the book to the students so that they will want to read it.

Provide time for sustained allent reading

Cut out activities and noise and have everyone read a book

Have youths read silently for a while, then have an activity, then read silently, etc. Prizes can be given, such as food coupons. Community volunteers can read aloud, and other similar entertainment can be provided between the silent reading sessions. Donations for pizza and drinks can be obtained from the community.

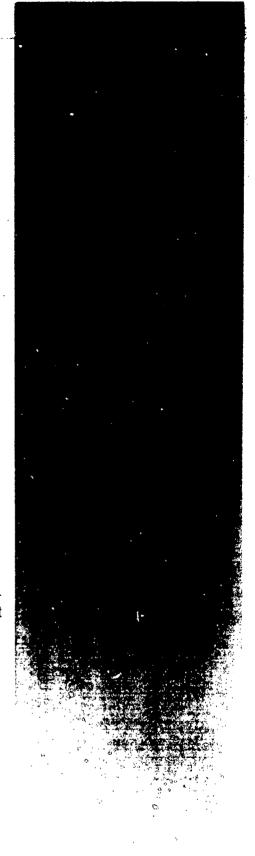

Young people can tell about their favorite books, all members of a group can read the same books and discuss them, and older youths can serve as book buddies to younger children.

It might be possible for a public library or school to provide a storyteller for the group.

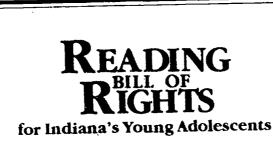

It is conceivable that many of the youths do not have a public library card, so they can be helped to obtain one. Many young people do not have the opportunity to visit the public library and to learn about all the materials available. A visit could open up a lifetime of reading pleasure.

After using the books, you and/or the young people involved might wish to thank the organization that provided the books. Some suggestions include:

- ₩rite a thank-you note.
- Invite the donors of your books to talk about their favorite books as a young adolescent.
- Provide a program for the members of the organization in which you and/or young people describe the good things that happened as a result of the generous gift of books.

All young adolescents in Indiana need access to the kinds of reading opportunities that will allow them to grow up to be successful members of a literate community. It is the responsibility of the entire community to offer support for providing these opportunities. Our ultimate goal is the creation of Communities of Readers where each young adolescent will be able to fulfill his or her potential as a reader.

To that end, we believe that Indiana's young adolescents deserve:

- Access to current, appealing, high-interest, and useful books and other reading materials in their classrooms, homes, public and school libraries, and other locations within the community.
- Schools that feature an environment where reading is valued, promoted, and encouraged.
- Dedicated time during the school day to read for a variety of purposesfor pleasure, information, and exploration.
- Teachers and school librarians who continually seek to renew their skills and excitement in sharing reading with young people through participation in diverse professional development activities.
- Public libraries that provide services specifically designed to engage young people's interest in reading.
- Community-based programs that encourage them in all aspects of their reading development.
- Opportunities for reading at home and support from schools, public libraries, and community agencies to families with young adolescents to encourage family reading activities.
- Communities of Readers in which all adults-in school, at home, and across the community-serve as role models and provide guidance to ensure that reading is a priority in young people's lives.
