ABSTRACT

In February 1995, Prince George's Community College (PGCC) conducted a study of all 8,739 students who graduated from the 18 community colleges in Maryland in fiscal year 1994. The study sought to determine outcomes for PGCC graduates with respect to their level of goal achievement, satisfaction with their college, transfer and employment status, and employment status while attending college. Outcomes for PGCC graduates were also compared to those for graduates statewide and from four peer colleges comparable in size to PGCC. Study findings, based on responses from 42% (n=337) of PGCC graduates and 48% (n=4,157) of the statewide graduates, included the following: (1) compared to graduates statewide and at the four peer colleges, PGCC had the highest percentage of graduates who indicated that they had completely achieved their goal in attending college at 76%; (2) compared to peer colleges, PGCC graduates who transferred were more likely to attend their senior institution part-time; (3) 53% of PGCC graduates had worked full-time while attending, compared to 43% of the statewide graduates; (4) 63% of PGCC graduates were employed full-time after graduation, compared to 56% of the statewide graduates; and (5) only 31% of PGCC graduates were employed in Prince George's County, while 42% were employed in the District of Columbia. The survey instrument is appended. (TGI)

GRADUATE FOLLOW-UP SURVEY, FY94
Research Brief RB96-14
March 1996

Introduction

This research brief presents findings from the Fiscal Year 1994 Graduate Follow-up Survey coordinated by the Maryland Higher Education Commission. Every other spring, each community college in the state administers an identical questionnaire to all students who graduated during the preceding fiscal year.

Following a brief overview of survey methodology, the report highlights findings in six areas:

- 1) Reasons for Attending Community College
- 2) Community College Goal Achievement
- 3) Satisfaction with Community College Services
- 4) Transfer to Senior Institutions
- 5) Employment Status while Attending Community College
- 6) Current Employment Status

Methodology

The survey instrument, designed by the Maryland Community College Research Group, was similar to that used in prior surveys (a copy is appended). In February 1995, surveys were mailed to all 8,739 students who graduated from the 18 community colleges in Maryland during fiscal year 1994. Two weeks after the initial mailing, a second survey packet was sent to all nonrespondents. State-wide, a total of 4,157 surveys were returned for analysis (resulting in a response rate of 48 percent). At Prince George's Community College, 337 surveys were collected from 811 graduates (for a response rate of 42 percent). The other large community colleges analyzed in this research brief (Anne Arundel Community College, Catonsville Community College, Essex Community College, and Montgomery College) had respective response rates corresponding to 577 surveys out of 1,084 graduates (or 53 percent), 358 surveys out of 794 graduates (or 45 percent), 396 surveys out of 938 graduates (or 42 percent), and 478 surveys out of 1,135 graduates (or 42 percent).

All tables in this research brief exclude missing cases. Percents may not sum to 100 due to rounding.

Reasons for Attending Community College

The table below addresses the most important reason that graduates gave for attending their community colleges. Graduates from each of the other large community colleges were more likely than graduates from PGCC to have attended for transfer purposes, with the likelihood higher by as much as 10 percentage points (38 percent at AACC versus 28 percent at PGCC). This pattern existed in fiscal year 1992 as well: 30 percent of PGCC graduates attended primarily for transfer purposes, compared to 39 percent of AACC graduates, 32 percent of CCC graduates, 39 percent of ECC graduates, and 32 percent of MC graduates.

Community College Goal Achievement

Most graduates reported that their most important reason for attending community college had been achieved. Of the 331 respondents from PGCC, 76 percent said their goal had been completely achieved, while 19 percent said partly achieved, and 5 percent said not achieved. These ratings differed by no more than 5 percentage points from the respective ratings at the other large community colleges. The percent of graduates reporting complete goal achievement was higher for PGCC than for the state average and all four peer colleges.

All Maryland community colleges are committed to ensuring that their graduates attain the knowledge, skills, and values associated with a liberal arts education. To facilitate this, all programs require completion of a specified number of credits in general education courses. Graduates are asked in the follow-up survey to rate (on a five-point scale) the extent to which their community college attendance helped them achieve 10 goals of general education.

Among PGCC graduates, the highest average ratings were given to enjoyment of learning (with a 4.04 average rating), clarification of academic/career goals (with a 3.92 average rating), and self-confidence (with a 3.89 average rating). These items received the highest average ratings at the other large community colleges as well. PGCC respondents gave the lowest ratings to the college's enhancement of their appreciation of art, music, and literature.

Satisfaction with Community College Services

Graduates were asked to rate various services at their community colleges on a five-point scale (1 equaled very poor, and 5 equaled very good). Classroom instruction and overall quality had the highest average ratings among PGCC graduates (with respective average ratings of 4.18 and 4.15). Similar average ratings were given by graduates from the other community colleges.

Transfer to Senior Institutions

The survey included a number of questions concerning the educational experiences of graduates after the completion of their community college programs. Forty-eight percent of the PGCC respondents indicated they had taken courses at a four-year college or university. In contrast to graduates from each of the other large community colleges, graduates from PGCC were more likely to take part-time loads (26 percent) and less likely to take full-time loads (22 percent). At the other large community colleges, the part-time figures were as low as 16 percent (for AACC and MC), while the full-time figures were as high as 40 percent (for AACC). During fiscal year 1992 as well, PGCC graduates were more likely to attend senior institutions on a part-time basis (25 percent) and less likely to attend on a full-time basis (23 percent) than were the graduates from other large community colleges. The lowest part-time rate was 16 percent (among AACC graduates). The highest full-time rate was for graduates of AACC and ECC (both at 37 percent).

Although students reported transferring to a variety of institutions, including private and public colleges both in and out of Maryland, four out of every five PGCC respondents attended one of three institutions: the University of Maryland at College Park, the University of Maryland University College, or Bowie State University. Among PGCC graduates, the respective percentages at UMCP, UMUC, and Bowie were 35 percent, 26 percent, and 18 percent. No other large community college had a higher enrollment rate at UMUC or Bowie. The next highest enrollment rate at UMUC was 18 percent (among MC graduates), while the next highest enrollment rate at Bowie was 2 percent (among AACC graduates and MC graduates). A similar pattern existed in fiscal year 1992, with 25 percent of PGCC graduates attending UMUC and 14 percent attending Bowie. MC sent the next highest number of graduates to UMUC (17 percent), and AACC was the only other large community college to send graduates to Bowie (3 percent).

Most respondents who had transferred continued in programs similar to their community college program. Among PGCC graduates, 48 percent were in the same fields, and 30 percent were in related fields. CCC had the fewest graduates in the same fields (34 percent or 14 percentage points lower than PGCC). Among fiscal year 1992 graduates, 50 percent of PGCC graduates studied in the same field as their community college program, versus 42 percent of AACC and CCC graduates.

How well did community college prepare students for study at senior institutions? Among PGCC graduates, 31 percent rated their preparation very good (with an average rating of 4.10). The college with the highest very good figure was AACC, with 40 percent of the respondents indicating very good and an average rating of 4.21.

Respondents were asked if any credit for community college courses for which they had received a grade of C or better had not been accepted at their transfer school. While 26 percent of PGCC graduates reported course rejections (with an average loss of 11 credit hours), the figure was as high as 44 percent of MC graduates (with an average loss of 10 credit hours). The corresponding proportions for fiscal year 1992 were 34 percent of PGCC graduates and 35 percent of MC graduates, with respective average losses of 11 credit hours and 12 credit hours.

Why were courses with grades of C or better rejected for transfer? PGCC graduates were more likely than graduates from the other community colleges to have courses rejected due to having had more courses than could be credited towards a bachelor degree (mentioned by 58 percent of 38 PGCC graduates versus as few as 34 percent of 61 CCC graduates). Given the number of graduates in the table below, differences among institutions may represent the experiences of a few individuals.

Employment Status while Attending Community College

Most respondents were employed while they attended the community college. In contrast to the graduates from other large community colleges, the graduates from PGCC were more likely to have worked full-time (53 percent at PGCC versus 48 percent at AACC, 52 percent at CCC, 37 percent at ECC, and 44 percent at MC). This pattern held in fiscal year 1992 as well, with 55 percent of PGCC students having been employed full-time (versus 46 percent for AACC, 51 percent for CCC, 41 percent for ECC, and 44 percent for MC graduates).

Current Employment Status

The survey asked about the employment status of graduates at the time of the survey, about 9 months after most had graduated from the community college. PGCC graduates were more likely than other large community college graduates to be employed full-time (68 percent at PGCC compared to a low of 51 percent at AACC, ECC, and MC) and less likely to be full-time students (16 percent among PGCC graduates and a high of 37 percent among AACC graduates). Among the class of 1992, 65 percent of PGCC graduates were employed full-time (versus 52 of AACC graduates, 63 percent of CCC graduates, 53 percent of ECC graduates, and 55 percent of MC graduates). Twenty-one percent of PGCC graduates were full-time students, while the respective figures for graduates from the other large community colleges were 33 percent, 31 percent, 34 percent, and 29 percent.

As expected, most graduates were employed in the same county as the college they attended, or in a neighboring jurisdiction. A plurality (42 percent) of PGCC graduates worked in Washington, DC, and less than a third (31 percent) were employed in Prince George's County. In contrast, 63 percent of the graduates of Montgomery College and 57 percent of the graduates of Anne Arundel Community College were employed in their respective counties.

When did the community college graduates begin their current jobs? While 39 percent of PGCC graduates had begun their jobs prior to enrolling, the figure was as low as 29 percent of MC graduates (during fiscal year 1992 the corresponding numbers were 40 percent at PGCC and 33 percent at MC). A difference of 10 percentage points existed between PGCC and CCC among graduates who started in their current jobs after graduation (37 percent of PGCC graduates compared to 27 percent of CCC graduates). In fiscal year 1992, the rate was 34 percent among PGCC graduates and 38 percent among CCC graduates.

Among full-time workers, a slightly higher percent of graduates from PGCC than from peer institutions rated their community college preparation for full-time employment as very good or good. For these two rating categories combined, the college received somewhat higher marks than the state average as well (83 percent very good or good compared to 78 percent very good or good).

Summary

This research brief presented findings from the Fiscal Year 1994 Graduate Follow-up Survey coordinated by the Maryland Higher Education Commission. Every other spring, each community college in the state administers an identical questionnaire to all students who graduated during the preceding fiscal year. At Prince George's Community College, 337 surveys were collected from 811 graduates (for a response rate of 42 percent). To place the PGCC findings in context, responses from the other large community colleges in Maryland (Anne Arundel Community College, Catonsville Community College, Essex Community College, and Montgomery College) were included. Among the findings for fiscal year 1994 graduates were that:

- * The percent of graduates reporting that they had completely achieved their goal in attending community college was higher for PGCC than for all four peer colleges and the state-wide average.
- * Compared to peer colleges, PGCC graduates who transferred were less likely to be full-time students at senior institutions.
- * PGCC graduates were most likely to transfer to University of Maryland campuses located in Prince George's County: the University of Maryland College Park, the University of Maryland University College, and Bowie State University accounted for nearly 80 percent of PGCC transfers.
- * 26 percent of PGCC graduates transferring to senior institutions lost credit in transfer, compared to 44 percent of transferring graduates from Montgomery College and a state-wide average of 34 percent. Three-fifths of PGCC graduates who lost credits in transfer did so because they had earned over 60 credits at PGCC.
- * 53 percent of PGCC graduates worked full-time while attending, versus 43 percent of all Maryland community college graduates.
- * 68 percent of PGCC graduates were employed full-time after graduation, compared to as few as 51 percent of graduates from Anne Arundel Community College, Essex Community College, and Montgomery College.
- * Less than a third of PGCC graduates were employed in Prince George's County. A plurality (42 percent) worked in the District of Columbia.
