ABSTRACT

This study examined the necessary elements for the development of a student orientation brochure for commuter students at Mount Vernon Nazarene College in Mount Vernon, Ohio. It reviewed nontraditional and commuter student literature and 10 commuter student brochures and orientation materials from other institutions. The orientation brochure that was developed was reviewed and validated internally and externally by professionals in enrollment services, student development, and adult education, along with commuter students currently attending the college. A revised orientation brochure was then reviewed by a final evaluator who is a nationally-recognized expert in the field of student transition to higher education. The brochure was printed and distributed to commuter students, administrators, faculty, and staff. Appendixes provide the names of the colleges whose materials were reviewed, a list of suggested components of an orientation brochure, a list of internal and external validators, suggestions for revisions, and a copy of the final brochure. Contains 10 references.

by

February, 1994

A brochure designed to help orient commuter students to the campus community of Mount Vernon Nazarene College (MVNC) was developed as a result of this study. The research question for this study was: What appropriate elements should be included in a student orientation brochure for MVNC's commuter (both traditional and non-traditional) students? The orientation brochure was developed from (a) a review of non-traditional and commuter student literature and (b) incorporating components from 10 samples of commuter orientation materials (from other institutions). The orientation brochure was validated (internally and externally) by professionals with knowledge in the following areas: (a) enrollment services; (b) student development; (c) commuter students currently attending MVNC; (d) adult education; and (e) commuter programs at various institutions. A revised orientation brochure was reviewed by a final evaluator who is recognized nationally as an expert in the field of assisting students with making the transition into institutions of higher education. A recommendation was made to print and distribute copies of the orientation brochure to the following individuals at MVNC: (a) commuter students; (b) administrators; (c) faculty; and (d) staff. It was also recommended that the director of retention (under the enrollment services administrative unit) be responsible for the updating, printing, and distribution of the orientation brochure since this position is responsible for all orientation activities at MVNC.

INTRODUCTION

Background and Significance

Mount Vernon Nazarene College (MVNC) is a church related coeducational college of arts and sciences that is sponsored and supported by the East Central Educational Region of the Church of the Nazarene including: (a) Ohio; (b) eastern Kentucky; and (c) West Virginia. It has a student body of over 1200 and is located in a small rural county in central Ohio. At least one third of the students come from families where parents are not college educated and at least 40% of the student body come from a rural or Appalachian county.

MVNC's primary mission is to provide a liberal arts education to traditional (college age) residential students. This is part of the identity of MVNC. However, about 30% of the student body is comprised of commuter students seeking an associate or bachelor degree. All campus housing at MVNC is designed exclusively for traditional students. Therefore all non-traditional students live off-campus. Commuter students include both traditional college age students who do not live on campus as well as non-traditional students. At MVNC, the terms commuter and off-campus are used interchangeably to describe the same type of student.

Since MVNC focuses so intensely on the traditional residential student, commuter students attending MVNC tend to be the forgotten or neglected group. Individually they are often highly regarded by faculty, staff, and traditional residential students. The problem lies with the fact that MVNC does not do a very good job making commuter students feel a part of the campus community. The traditional residential student is able to informally learn about the details of the campus community through: (a) reading notices placed on bulletin boards in the cafeteria and dormitories; (b) roommate(s); (c) casual conversations in the residential student lobbies; and (d) a strong informal network of friends and classmates who live on campus. By asking questions or reading a multitude of publications, commuter students can also find out the details concerning academic life, campus life, available campus services, and required administrative processes (such as registration and parking regulations). However, the typical commuter student is generally pre-occupied with activities and concerns apart from MVNC leaving little time or energy to aggressively pursue this information.

The purpose of this study was to develop a concise, informational brochure directed toward commuter students. Prior to the implementation of this study, the following components were considered for inclusion in the final brochure: (a) library hours and policies; (b) athletic and intramural activities; (c) bookstore hours and policies; (d) on-campus parking policies; (e) registration procedures; (f) where to store personal belongings while on-campus; (g) dress code; (h) behavioral expectations; (i) how to drop or add classes during the semester; (j) process for voicing complaints to student council; (k) alternatives for child care; (l) drama and cultural events held on-campus; (m) use of personal on-campus mail box; (n) snow days and class attendance; (o) chapel attendance; and (p) other general concerns of commuter students at MVNC. The actual components included in the final brochure were determined by use of the development method as part of this study.

The percentage of commuter students attending MVNC justifies that more attention be focused on this group. Administrative offices on campus often experience frustration when attempting to communicate with commuter students regarding procedures. On the other hand, commuter students are often frustrated about the lack of communication regarding procedures. A lack of communication exists because commuter students do not have the same on-campus informal communication networks that traditional residential students have. The development and eventual distribution of this brochure will help enable commuter students to quickly reference important information about MVNC. This will contribute to a more satisfactory campus life experience for commuter students.

This study directly relates to the Emergence of Higher Education in America seminar (Wattenbarger, Bryant, Kintzer, & Varcoe, 1993), specifically to the sections regarding the treatment of non-traditional and commuter students by institutions who focus on the traditional residential student. Higher education is emerging as having an increasing number and larger percentage of commuter students attending traditional residential institutions. The readings in this seminar express concern over the responsiveness of traditional residential campus communities to these students.

Research Question

What appropriate elements should be included in a student orientation brochure for MVNC's commuter (both traditional and non-traditional) students? The development of this brochure for eventual printing and distribution was the focus of this study.

Chapter 2

REVIEW OF THE LITERATURE

Non-Traditional and Commuter Students

The current definition of a non-traditional student is generally so vague that it is usually determined by the observer (Millard, 1991). Most institutions use it to classify any student who is not of traditional college age. Those over the age of 25 are usually classified as non-traditional (Brazziel, 1989).

The current definition of a commuter student includes ". . . all students who do not live in institution-owned housing" (Jacoby, 1989, p. 2). This population includes the following: (a) traditional and non-traditional college age students; (b) full-time and part-time students; and (c) married and single students.

At MVNC, almost all residential students are traditional college age students. Though many commuter students at MVNC are of traditional college age, the problem of helping commuter students make the academic and nonacademic transition into MVNC's campus life is similar for both traditional and non-traditional off-campus students. The term off-campus student is commonly used at MVNC when classifying the commuter (traditional and non-traditional) student.

Historical Review of Non-traditional Students

The definition of the non-traditional student has changed throughout history. During the Colonial Period, colleges were designed primarily for the sons of aristocrats. Therefore, during this time period the definition of non-traditional student included such groups as the poor, women, minorities, and eventually older students.

The integration of new types of students into a college setting is always perceived as being a problem due to a change in the stated or unstated mission of the college and a change in the social climate for the current students (Wechsler, 1989). The definition of traditional and non-traditional students changed when colleges adopted new patterns of matriculating: (a) poor; (b) female; (c) ethnically and racially diverse; and (d) older students (Copland, 1989; Dwyer, 1989; Rudolph, 1990; Wechsler, 1989; Wright, 1989).

During the Colonial Period, non-traditional students would have included those from non-aristocratic families or racial minority groups (such as the attempt to educate the Indians). During the Jacksonian era, the non-traditional student would have been the charity student who was provided a place to live, but was treated as second class by traditional students. During most of the 1800's women were considered to be non-traditional students. This label stuck even though they were admitted to Oberlin College in 1837 and to other institutions (developed just for women) during most of the 1800's. For the first third of the 1900's the Jewish student was considered non-traditional. Students of color were classified as non-traditional till the second half of the 1900's. The current universal definition of a non-traditional student (as stated earlier) is the older adult (generally over 25 years old) who is enrolled in an associate or bachelor degree program.

Current Situation for Non-Traditional Students

Lynton and Elman (1987) state that the number of non-traditional students attending all types of higher educational institutions is increasing. One type of non-traditional student exhibits the intermittent pattern of college attendance. While working toward a degree, this student may stop out from time to time for one reason or another (Warren, 1985). Non-traditional students also represent an increasing number of students who begin college at an older age and then attend straight through without stopping out.

Regardless of the attendance pattern, the non-traditional student represents the fastest growing segment of higher education. This is triggered by the need for advanced education to remain employable in the current job market (Brazziel, 1989). "The modern world demands that people learn all through their lives, and increasing numbers of adults, in turn, are demanding access to learning and educational resources" (Thomas, 1991, p. 160). The traditional residential college age student that has been the focus at MVNC, accounts for only 20% of all students currently enrolled nationally in higher education (Aslanian, 1993).

Institutions similar to MVNC are often not ready to deal with the special needs of commuter (traditional and non-traditional) students. Several studies have been conducted dealing with the problem of integrating these students into the mainstream of campus life (Bonifacio, Sinatra, & Welch, 1991; Hazzard, 1993; Huntley, 1993). Commuter students are often dealing with off-campus pressures such as: (a) outside employment and (b) spouse and offspring. This is often compounded by an improper design or lack of the following on campus processes and services: (a) admissions; (b) counseling; (c) parking; (d) registration; (e) student support services (library, offices, bookstore); (f) child care; (g) finances; and (h) orientation. Required administrative processes and services are oftentimes designed specifically for the traditional (college age) residential student. Needed services such as child care are often not available. The orientation process is designed primarily for the traditional student.

When they attend institutions where they are clearly in the minority, older freshmen often feel "different," out of place, and perhaps even out of sync with societal expectations attributed to specific age groups. In short, adult reentry into higher education is fraught with difficulty, and institutions need to become aware of adult-learner needs, both academic and nonacademic. (Copland, 1989, p. 305.)

How do higher educational institutions respond to this growing group of students? Millard (1991) states that this group is generally not actively involved in campus functions and that isolation is often designed into the program for the non-traditional student. The non-traditional student may be enrolled in a program designed primarily for traditional students or in a program designed specifically for the non-traditional student (often called adult education). In either case, there is a need to help orient the non-traditional student into the general functions of the campus (Bean, 1990; Levitz & Noel, 1989; Millard, 1991).

Orientation Printed Materials

Commuter (traditional and non-traditional) students usually cannot learn about the details of the campus community through: (a) reading notices placed on bulletin boards in the cafeteria and dormitories; (b) roommate(s); (c) casual conversations in the residential student lobbies; and (d) a strong informal network of friends and classmates on campus. Institutions need to be creative in developing ways to communicate to the commuter student (National Clearinghouse for Commuter Programs [NCCP], 1992a, 1992b, 1992c).

Copland (1989) states that commuter students can benefit from the use of printed materials specifically designed to acclimate them toward the campus community. The best tools available should be used to enhance the communication process between commuter students and the institution (Jacoby, 1989).

Several institutions use various forms of printed materials directed toward the commuter student. This is a communication strategy designed to inform the commuter student about the services and administrative processes of the campus community.

Central Missouri State University produces on a semester basis, a form containing the final examination schedule. It is printed on index weight paper and is distributed to commuters just prior to final exams. It also contains pertinent information regarding the next semester. The rationale for this form (called Memo) is ". . . to give commuter students accurate information in a timely fashion" (Gower, 1993, p. 76).

James Madison University publishes the Off Campus Calendar for commuter students. It is distributed to all commuter students at the beginning of the term and contains the following information: (a) security issues; (b) tips on locating housing; and (c) dates of campus events (Maher, 1993).

The Commuting Students Handbook (published by Fordham University) is designed to meet the needs of commuter students. The format of the handbook is 8 1/2 in by 5 1/2 in (28 pages) in order to fit nicely into a car's glove compartment. It contains information regarding: (a) parking; (b) vehicle registration; (c) campus hours; and (d) administrative and departmental telephone numbers. The feedback from commuter students regarding the handbook's usefulness has been positive. The handbook is updated annually (Nonnamaker, 1993).

Kent State University developed the Resource Rack to distribute information to commuter students. It is located in a centralized place and is accessible for commuter students. The racks contain the following information: (a) area transit schedules; (b) campus telephone directories; (c) information on tenant/landlord rights; (d) area utility company brochures; (e) leasing information; and (f) pamphlets on community and campus resources and services (Schultz, 1993).

The Age Advantage is published by Texas A & M University. This orientation handbook is designed to address the needs of the adult learner. In the past, Texas A & M University was strongly positioned as a traditional-aged college institution but slowly and steadily they are having to change as the size of the adult learner population increases (Seff, 1993).

Bowling Green State University produced a simple communication piece called the Top 25 Reasons Bookmark. The goal of the bookmark is to make commuter students aware of various available services. It is in an easy to carry format. The goal is not to give a comprehensive description of all services available, but to make students aware of existing services and how to procure additional information (Witschi, 1993).

The need for an orientation brochure designed for commuter (both traditional and non-traditional) students attending MVNC as well as the specific components to be contained therein is supported by the literature review. The literature indicates that the non-traditional student population will continue to grow. The need for an orientation brochure at MVNC will at least remain steady and possibly increase over the next few years. Printed material designed to communicate about required administrative processes and campus services to the commuter population at MVNC is supported by the literature review as one solution for helping with the transition into campus life.

Chapter 3

METHODOLOGY AND PROCEDURES

Methodology

Development methodology was used in the design of this orientation brochure. This method was chosen because a problem (helping commuter students at MVNC become aware of both the required administrative processes as well as available campus services) was identified that could potentially be solved through the implementation of a properly developed orientation brochure. Often the purpose of a development study is to find a solution to a specific problem through the development of a product. The product can be in any of the following forms: (a) plan; (b) program; (c) process; (d) model; (e) handbook (or brochure); (f) instructional unit; or (g) course (Robinson & Woolf, 1991). For this study the product was in the form of a brochure.

Procedures

A general review of literature related to the research question was completed. This included a review of non-traditional and commuter student literature.

Following the review of literature, institutions of higher education were contacted by mail and through telephone in order to obtain samples of orientation material directed at the commuter student. Samples received were analyzed based upon the type of information included and the format in which the information was presented.

A document listing suggested components for possible inclusion in the orientation brochure was created based on the results of the analysis of the orientation samples. A generic letter was composed to provide background information and instructions for the internal validators as part of the internal validation process. The suggested components document and letter were sent to the internal validators. The internal validators were competent professionals who supervise areas at MVNC covered within the orientation brochure. The results of the review of the suggested components document were incorporated into an initial draft of the orientation brochure. This draft was sent to the internal validators for additional review and suggestions. The initial draft of the brochure was revised based upon the comments of the internal validators.

The revised draft of the orientation brochure was sent, along with a generic letter (similar to the one created for the internal validators) of instruction, to the external validators. The external validators were professionals who were selected for professional competence and knowledge related to key elements of the orientation brochure. Suggestions made by the external validators were considered for inclusion in a second revised draft of the orientation brochure.

The final evaluator was selected based upon national recognition for expertise in the area of assisting students with making the transition into institutions of higher education. The second revised draft of the orientation brochure along with a letter of instruction was sent to the final evaluator for review. After suggestions were received from the final evaluator, a final draft of the orientation brochure was developed. The orientation brochure is ready for printing and mass distribution to all commuter students attending MVNC.

Definition of Terms

For this study, students over the age of 25 are classified as non-traditional. The current definition applied to a non-traditional student is generally so vague that it is usually determined by the observer (Millard, 1991).

The definition of a commuter student includes ". . . all students who do not live in institution-owned housing" (Jacoby, 1989, p. 2). This population includes the following: (a) traditional and non-traditional college age students; (b) full-time and part-time students; and (c) married and single students.

At MVNC, almost all residential students are traditional college age students. Though many commuter students at MVNC are also of traditional college age, the problem of assisting all commuter students with making both the academic and nonacademic transitions into MVNC's campus life is similar for both traditional and non-traditional students. The term off-campus student is commonly used at MVNC when classifying the commuter (traditional and non-traditional) student.

Assumptions

It was assumed that judgments made by the internal and external validators as well as the final evaluator were both reliable and valid with regard to key points contained in the orientation brochure. This study also made the assumption that an orientation brochure could be developed (and later printed and distributed) which would help provide a solution for the problem of orienting commuter students enrolled at MVNC toward the required administrative processes and campus services.

Limitations

The validation process used by the internal and external validators as well as the final evaluator is subjective in nature. It would be difficult to replicate the same judgment from a group of similar professionals. This will result in an imperfect validation and evaluation of the orientation brochure.

Chapter 4

RESULTS

Many sources related to non-traditional and commuter students were reviewed. Primary sources used were textbooks and recommended reading books listed in the study guide for the Emergence of Higher Education in America seminar (Wattenbarger, Bryant, Kintzer, & Varcoe, 1993). Other appropriate sources included: (a) ERIC documents; (b) journals; and (c) professional publications (such as those produced by the National Clearinghouse for Commuter Programs).

Following the review of literature, 136 institutions were contacted by mail and through telephone requesting samples of orientation material aimed at the commuter student (see Appendix A). Printed samples were received from 37 institutions.

Of the 37 responses, 10 samples were selected as suitable for using as a model in the development of an orientation brochure for MVNC (Aurora University: Adult Students, 1992; Barat College: Adult Re-entry, 1992; Bowling Green State University: Where to Go for Help, 1992; College of Saint Francis: 1992-1993 Adult Student Handbook, 1992; College of Saint Mount Saint Joseph: Liberal Studies Program, 1992; Iowa State University: Update, 1993; Kent State University: Office of Adult Student Services, 1992; Mount Union College: After Hours, 1993; Ohio State University: On the Move, 1992; Western Illinois University: Directory of Services for Adult Students, 1992). Required administrative processes, campus services, and various other issues relevant to commuter students were identified as pertinent for inclusion in MVNC's orientation brochure.

A Suggested Components Document for Developing an Orientation Brochure for the Commuter Student (see Appendix B) was created based upon the results of the analysis of orientation samples received and the review of the literature. A letter of instruction was created, explaining the expectation of internal validation (see Appendix C). The letter presented the purpose of creating an orientation brochure. Copies of the letter and document were sent to the internal validators (see Appendix D).

After the initial responses to the document were received, the Mount Vernon Nazarene College Orientation Brochure for the Commuter Student was created incorporating suggested components from the original document (Appendix B) along with the internal validators' suggestions (see Appendix E). The brochure was sent to the original internal validators for additional review.

The external validation process was accomplished by sending a letter of instruction (similar to the one in Appendix C) explaining the external validation process along with a copy of the brochure. The external validators (see Appendix D) were selected based upon their knowledge and experience in the following areas: (a) adult education; (b) awareness of various commuter programs nationwide; and (c) student development. Suggestions from the external validators were considered for inclusion in the brochure (see Appendix E).

The revised brochure was reviewed by the final evaluator (see Appendix D) who is recognized nationally as an expert in the field of assisting students with making the transition into institutions of higher education. See Appendix F for the final draft of the brochure that incorporates the results of the final evaluation. The brochure is ready for printing and mass distribution to all commuter (both traditional and non-traditional) students attending MVNC.

Chapter 5

DISCUSSION, CONCLUSIONS, IMPLICATIONS, AND RECOMMENDATIONSDiscussion

The research question for this study was: What appropriate elements should be included in a student orientation brochure for MVNC's commuter (traditional and non-traditional) students? The final product was an orientation brochure targeted at commuter students attending MVNC. The brochure is ready for printing and mass distribution.

Communicating information (about required administrative processes and available campus services) to commuter students requires special effort on the part of the institution (Copland, 1989; Jacoby 1989). Information pertinent to commuter students may already be available, but not in a manner that is easily accessible. MVNC is designed around the traditional (college age) residential student. Commuter students often are not aware of campus services available to them. The commuter student needs not only to be made aware of campus services but also alerted to the fact that all students are welcome to use these services.

The development of the orientation brochure had to deal with the following issues. First, it is designed to be easy to carry (3 in by 5 in format). Second, it lists all required administrative processes (such as registration and parking regulations). Third, it lists all available campus services. It also lists community information that many commuter students will find helpful: (a) child care; (b) employment; and (c) housing. The information is presented in a concise format. The orientation brochure briefly relays to the commuter student what is required and available and then gives instructions about how to find additional information. The brochure provides the commuter student with an overview of the MVNC environment.

To insure that the orientation brochure included the proper components necessary to orient the commuter student, internal and external experts were used to validate the design and content. The range of professional competencies allowed for validation from the following viewpoints: (a) enrollment services; (b) student development; (c) commuter students currently attending MVNC; (d) adult education; and (e) director and publications coordinator of the National Clearinghouse for Commuter Programs. After the internal and external validations were completed, a final evaluator was used to review the brochure as an orientation tool. Suggested revisions from both the validators and evaluator were considered for inclusion and a final orientation brochure was developed (ready for printing and mass distribution) as a proposed solution to the research question.

Conclusions

As was expected, a brochure was developed that is available as an orientation tool to make commuter students aware of the total MVNC environment. All key administrative processes and available campus services are included in the brochure. The orientation brochure is a competent product for orienting commuter students, making use of the development methodology as a problem solving method.

Implications

The printing and mass distribution of the orientation brochure will allow MVNC to begin focusing on the special needs of the commuter student who comprises up to 30% of the student body. The adoption of the orientation brochure will be an indication that MVNC is beginning to recognize the presence and importance of the commuter student.

If MVNC's enrollment reflects the current national trend, there will be an increasing percentage of commuter students (primary growth is in the non-traditional segment) enrolled at MVNC in the coming years. In order to maintain continuity of a positive campus life at MVNC, it is important to deal with the current problem of making commuter students feel a part of the campus community. As a result of this brochure, it is expected that commuter students will have a better understanding of the campus community. This should result in the commuter student experiencing less frustration and alienation. The student can then spend more time and energy focusing on: (a) academic course work; (b) cultural life; and (c) general MVNC community life. Even if the commuter student has a limited amount of time available for campus involvement, the brochure should help the student assimilate more readily into the campus community. The orientation brochure can contribute to the overall orientation process.

Recommendations for the Improvement of Practice

MVNC should print and distribute the orientation brochure developed as a result of this study (see Appendix F). Each commuter student should receive 2 copies of the orientation brochure: (a) one to carry and (b) one to keep in the car's glove compartment (Nonnamaker, 1993). To make people more aware of the commuter students' presence on campus, copies should be distributed to all administrators, faculty, and staff (Nonnamaker, 1993).

The enrollment services division is responsible for all orientation activities for MVNC. The director of retention (works in the enrollment services division) will be responsible for all future orientation activities. It is recommended that the director of retention be responsible for the updating, printing, and distribution of the brochure as an orientation activity for commuter students attending MVNC.

APPENDIX C

Suggested Components Document Letter

Ronald Bolender
Director of Retention and Academic Support Services

October 12, 1993

Michael Clyburn, Ed.D.
Dean of Student Development

Dear Dr. Clyburn:

I am working on a practicum project for Nova University dealing with off-campus traditional and non-traditional age students. The focus of this project is to create an orientation brochure (that is easy to carry) directed at helping commuter (traditional and non-traditional) students to become aware of the total MVNC environment.

I have enclosed a Suggested Components Document for developing an orientation brochure for the commuter student. This document was developed after reviewing orientation/directory documents from ten other universities/colleges. The question and answer approach was the most appealing. None of the documents were a perfect model for MVNC.

After you have reviewed the Suggested Components Document, please respond to the following questions (feel free to write your responses on the document):

(a) Is there a need for an easy to carry orientation brochure for commuter students at MVNC? Why or why not?

(b) What suggestions would you make in regards to the various components of the Suggested Components Document (such as "cafeteria," "mail," "snow days," "study areas," and "withdrawing")? Do you have any suggestions for what components ought to be included and/or questions that need to be asked?

(c) Do you have any general suggestions regarding the development of this brochure?

I would appreciate the return of the Suggested Components Document and comments by October 20, 1993. You will receive a draft of the brochure by October 28, 1993. If you have any question please call me at 4532.

Sincerely,

Ronald Bolender

APPENDIX E

Suggested Orientation Brochure Revisions

Internal Validators

"There is a need for this type of material to be distributed to off-campus students. An easy to carry brochure will be a useful tool."

"Don't put too many details in this brochure (for such areas as financial aid). Give references to the college catalogue."

"How do I change advisors?"

"Where are athletic events primarily conducted?"

"What intercollegiate sports are sponsored by MVNC?"

"Where do I get tickets?"

"How do I participate in sports as well as boosters?"

"Are there snack or grill facilities?"

"Who do I call if I am locked out of my car?"

"Are children allowed in the classrooms?"

"How do I develop and present a complaint?"

"Are there special computer equipment and software discounts available at the bookstore?"

"Is there career placement and job assistance available for the off-campus student?"

"What about the confidentiality issue in the counseling center?"

"How do you find out about future cultural events?"

"Where are most of the cultural events held?"

"Where are first aid supplies kept around campus?"

"Is the college responsible for damage or theft of my personal belongings?"

"Where is the campus post office located?"

"How do I obtain a transcript?"

"There needs to be a section for dress standards."

"What are the expected behavioral standards?"

"How do I report harassment?"

"Add details about school closings."

"Where are the coffee and snack machine locations on campus?"

External Validators

"I could not find a thing that was left out. I teach Freshmen Seminar for re-entry (adult) students and I think you covered everything my students ask."

"The only suggestion that I would have is to have a good table of contents so the students can find information easily."

"I especially like the thoughtfulness demonstrated by descriptions of things like child care, snow days, vending, study areas, etc."

". . . include a table of contents or index . . ."

"Throughout the document you refer to off-campus students, and yet most of the material seems applicable to all students at the college. If your goal is to provide off-campus students with orientation information that is specific to them then you need to perhaps highlight the particular commuter issues."

Again, an orientation brochure accompanied by a student handbook would be a good approach."

"I agree that the question-answer format is the best approach, however, most of your questions are phrased in the passive voice. I would recommend changing the questions to a more reader-friendly approach (e.g., 'How can I . . . ' and 'Where do I . . . '). This will help students read the material and feel that it is more applicable and important."

Final Evaluator

"To answer your questions, yes, I believe there is a need for what you described as 'an easy to carry, orientation brochure for off campus students at my institution.' This is mainly because off campus students have greater difficulty obtaining and accessing information about the institution. I would quibble with you, however, in that what you have provided is not exactly what I would call a 'brochure.' Brochure to me connotes something very superficial and succinct. Your project is much more ambitious than that. I think that at the very least, we would have to entitle your project something on the order of a booklet and simply call it a 'publication.' But it is more than a brochure."

"I have no suggestions to make as to the components of your proposed publication. What you've done seems to me to be very thorough. I really don't know enough about your institution to know what you might be omitting but I believe what you've presented looks very thorough. Other than the above, I would have no further suggestions regarding the development of your publication. You seem to know exactly what you are doing and I believe that your students would find the publication as is, extremely useful. So I hope you proceed with it and are able to actually produce it for your students. It's a very nice piece. It's thorough yet succinct in it's very byte--like presentation of information segments. It's easily readable. Good work."
