ABSTRACT

This paper discusses a class project in which a broadcast education professor's students at Southern Arkansas University produced campus news stories for the local NBC affiliate--the affiliate ran the stories once a week on their newscasts. The paper begins with a short explanation of course requirements for Advanced Electronic News Gathering and how news stories are selected and reported. The paper continues with an edited videotape consisting of news stories recently produced and aired, followed by scripts of productions. Some of the scripts reproduced in the paper contain news stories about homecoming, non-traditional students, residence hall life, the business school, the political affairs club, and agriculture students and cattle ranching. The paper notes that in the course special attention is paid to video editing by phrase or complete sentence; writing in a conversational style; logical sequencing of shots; making sound bites meaningful; ensuring that "stand-ups" further story progression; utilizing natural sound where appropriate; and shooting footage whose composition and movement do not call attention to themselves. In 1990, I reached an agreement with the NBC affiliate near my institution to broadcast campus news stories on its newscasts once a week. Students in my Advanced Electronic News Gathering course are responsible for producing these reports, and I as executive producer critique them and suggest changes if necessary. These reports consist of hard and feature news events taking place at the university.

This intensive hands-on experience runs the gamut of news gathering and editing procedures students can expect to encounter in entry-level news reporting positions. They use industrial Super-VHS equipment in the production process and transfer completed stories to 3/4 inch videotape for broadcast by the NBC affiliate.

The program will begin with a short explanation of course requirements and how news stories are selected and reported. This will be followed by an edited videotape consisting of news stories recently produced and aired. Scripts of productions follow this page. VHS videotapes of these and other student-produced reports are available upon request.

Of significance to broadcast educators are the methods by which agreements can be reached with stations to air college news reports on stations serving communities adjacent to their institutions. In addition, special attention will be paid to: video editing by phrase or complete sentence; writing in a conversational style; logical sequencing of shots; making sound bites meaningful; ensuring that stand-ups further story progression; utilizing natural sound where appropriate; and shooting footage whose composition and movement do not call attention to themselves.
