ABSTRACT

This final performance report for Groton Public Library's Project LIFT (Libraries Involve Families Today), an outreach program designed to promote literacy among low-income families, begins with a section that provides quantitative data. The role of the library in the project is then described; participating organizations and sites used are listed; and Project LIFT is discussed. An attached narrative report, written by Natalie J. Hinshaw, discusses the accomplishments of Project LIFT during 1992-93, focusing on the activities of a roving storyteller who conducted story hours at Head Start, day care, and family support centers, and presented workshops for adult audiences. Anecdotal evidence is used to show that the project realized its goals--to motivate children, parents, and caregivers to read together and to reach adults who have reading difficulty by allowing books to flow to them through their preschoolers. Statistics are included on sites visited, registrants, story hours, and other programs. Proposed and actual expenditures are compared. (MES)

4. As in year one, the Groton Public Library has been a resource site as well as being an integral part of the implementation process of Project L.I.F.T.

The library continues to be a source of reading materials, including literacy materials, and also functions as a referral agency for adults and children who are participants in the L.I.F.T. program.

The library helps to implement the project in a variety of ways. It provides parking space for the L.I.F.T. van. It provides meeting rooms and work spaces for people processing books and doing all of the other support work which is necessary to maintain the "bookmobile" aspect of the project. All record keeping is done at the library, as well as staff training and all administrative functions. The library also functions as the public relations center for the project. In effect, the library provides the base from which the L.I.F.T. Project reaches out into the community.

7. The Federal project has had a beneficial impact on Groton Public Library. It has increased and supplemented the outreach capabilities of the library. It continues to support the library's literacy programs, and increases the awareness of the community about the various literacy and other library services available. It also increases the level of business as community members use the literacy and referral services offered. A variety of other agencies have contacted the library for information about the project, and have requested that the services provided by the L.I.F.T. Project be expanded to include services to their agencies and clients.

PROJECT LIFT

(October 1, 1992—September 30, 1993)

I. The Story

Project LIFT (Libraries Involve Families Today) was an outreach program designed by TVCCA, LVA and the Groton Public Library to promote literacy among low-income families in Groton and New London, Connecticut. A small van, known as the "LIFT-mobile," was leased and fitted out with bookshelves to become a library-on-wheels. I was employed as the "Roving Reader." During the fall, winter and spring I visited 15 headstart, day care and family support centers where I conducted a total of 183 story hours for adults and children. In the summer I visited five sites and did 39 story hours. I also conducted 23 other programs, including workshops and activities for adult audiences. During the year a total of 13,512 books were circulated (ie: over 27,000 books checked out and in!), and another 1208 books were given away to participants who earned them. (See addendum for details.)

Our goal was to motivate children, parents and care givers to read together, and to reach adults who have reading difficulty by allowing books to flow to them through their preschoolers. Though the numbers show how many books we put out there and how many people we reached, these figures do not tell the whole story. That comes from the participants themselves. We purposely were not structured like a school: no one was required to participate. Although we had captive audiences, no one was obligated to take out a book.

In the first year of the program (1992-93) some parents were reluctant to register for our program, though the children were eager to gobble up the books. Some parents commented "We have too many books at home." "We don't need books." "We don't have time for reading." As the program got underway, these comments turned to "Can't you come more often?" "When are you coming back?" "I wish you'd come in the summer, too." or "Antonio misses the books."

This year, registration at the sites I visited the previous year was handled by the centers themselves as a part of their regular program registration. For new registrations, I found talking to parents one-on-one was far more effective than explaining our program to parents' meetings. To meet the parents and care givers,

I arrived at the centers early and greeted them when they brought in the children.

Families learned respect and responsibility for the books they borrowed and earned. Almost everyone returned their books one way or another. Each child earned a green ticket for every book returned, which then allowed him/her to check out another book. We applauded the child as s/he came up to receive the ticket, and I shook their hands. The children experience reward for success as well as a lesson in eye-contact.

When books were not returned, the child received a yellow slip, a sad slip, to remind the family that books were overdue. Then we discussed what that meant: "you still have two books at home, so love them some more and bring them back next time so you can get two more books." Some books were lost, ripped and "over-loved," but no one was ever reprimanded for that. I asked only that the child tell me what happened. After that, we considered the books returned, and s/he could take out two more books. As a colleague once said, "What's the worst thing that can happen? Someone has a book to read."

The children learned very quickly about responsibility, and they were empowered. When I arrived at a center, they would greet me with hugs and "Miss Natalie, I brought my books back!" "Miss Natalie, I forgot my books." or "... my mom will bring them later ... my little sister ripped up my books ... my mom threw my books away..." Sometimes a child was devastated because s/he forgot the books. But we always talked about it, and the books were back the next time or I knew what became of them. A staff member said, "You don't know how wonderful it is for the parents who work full time to have these books. It's hard to get to the library after a full day's work." Another mother reported "Now Destiny has her own books like her older brothers and sisters who bring books home from school. We're all reading. We love it. No TV!" A father said, "Stephen made me read four books last night."

Besides the story hours and book check-out time with the children and parents, a vital part of the program was one-on-one interaction and being sensitive to the individual's needs. Many of our accomplishments came spontaneously during meal time, craft time and even in the parking lot. One day, while eating lunch with the children, Shatondra, who had been a discipline problem all morning, started telling me her story about her soon-to-happen move south to live with her grandmother. Her mother couldn't take care of her and work too, she told me. After lunch we found her a book, "Teddy Bear's Moving Day," and some others for her to take with her and share with grandmother. You cannot measure something like this—but you know you have made a difference in a child's life.

Another day Tiffany refused to take out books. I talked to her at lunch and discovered that she wanted a special book, Rapunzel, which she couldn't find. Since she was too young to read, she did not know how to search for a similar book. I showed her other fairy tales, and she went home happy with two new books.

One story hour, while I was "doing" The Very Hungry Spider, by Eric Carle, as usual I invited staff, parent and child participation. The children always jump right in, but often it is difficult to involve parents and staff. One mother refused to participate when it came to swallowing the fly. I urged her to enter in, but she balked. I let this go, thinking my own negative thoughts. But as the story moved on, she began to participate in an exciting way and I thought to myself, "See what I've accomplished!" Later she said, "I hate flies. We have too many of them at home." Then I realized that, like children, adults also have hidden agendas. I discovered how important it is not to make judgements but instead to be sensitive to each individual's needs and feelings.

One of my favorite centers to visit was "A Mother's Place" in New London. Here I was able to work with moms without threatening them with a literacy program. They enjoyed the books so much that they took on the task of checking them in and out, giving me time not only to do story hours for their children, but also to offer special programs for adults. During a doll making workshop for the mothers I shared the picture book Abuela, by Arthur Dorros. As we made grandmother dolls, one mother said "I loved that book you read. I never had anyone read to me before." Later the director, Barbara Montgomery, told me that this was the first time that particular mother had joined in and participated with the group.

Two of the mothers from "A Mother's Place" also helped me at other sites, and were particularly involved with helping themselves as well as their children. "What can I do to prepare my child for Headstart?" Diane asked me. "Are there any workbooks?" "Just read as much as you can with your child," I responded. It was as if "Is that all?" For those mothers who had not been read to when they were children, it was apparent that reading to their children was a very new experience; they were amazed at how much the little ones loved it. So many mothers told me how many books they read with their children and how much the children loved it. The results of the reading together program we started in January showed the extent of the parent involvement. Bean and Sabrina's mother said proudly "I built a special shelf for the books we earned; for only the ones I read to them."

At the Groton Public Library I gave a literary awareness workshop and book give away to parents and children from Groton and Gillis Headstart. My approach was not to tell them what to do, but to share stories and talk about the joys of reading. I used one story in particular, "Chew Your Rock Candy," created by fellow storyteller and colleague Doug Lipman (found in his Spinning Tales, Weaving Hope: Stories of Peace, Justice & the Environment) which tells how to get rid of a monster. Kim Jones, who is an LVA student and now a teacher's aid at Groton Headstart, loves that story and now tells it with the children. After I told the story in the workshop, Kim told the group that her "monster" had been her own inability to read, and that by going to LVA she had been able to get rid of this monster. A courageous thing to do.

I did a story hour for toddlers at El Centro de la Comunidad while their parents were in an ESL class. After the story hour, I observed the adult class, and it brought back memories of when I first lived in El Salvador and then Mexico; and how I struggled to learn a new language as an adult. I remembered how easy this was for my children—but not for me! Then I recalled how much I was helped when I discovered my own children's books. I told the El Centro parents my story in Spanish and asked if they would like me to bring them stories and books. We then added bilingual books to our multi-cultural collection and a new door opened. I spent an hour with 32 ESL students every two weeks while their teachers were in a staff meeting. We exchanged stories comparing cultures. I would read in English and they would read in Spanish. I encouraged everyone to read at least one paragraph. Many had trouble reading on an adult level in their own language, and some said they could not read. But once urged to do so, their eyes lit up as they discovered that they could read and enjoy children's books. One day during the morning coffee break I observed three men who had resisted taking out books give up their social time and become engrossed in reading.

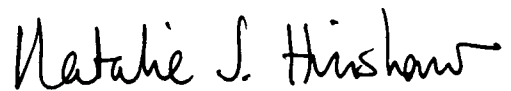

Teresa told me how much she enjoyed reading to her grandchildren and how much it helped her with her English. Ismail also told how reading helped his English. One mother said that she couldn't read the books her children brought home from school, but now she could share stories in Spanish with them. We became good friends. At the end of the school year I was honored to be invited to the El Centro annual dinner and awards night, and to share in their successes. Today I exchange greetings with my new friends all over New London.

This summer at Winthrop the community room was not available for my program on the last day, so I set up a table in the back of the building and opened the doors to the book van. Children flocked to get books. They sat down on the asphalt to enjoy them and then came back for more. Carmen, a pregnant lady, climbed on board the van, squeezed between the book crates, and spent the afternoon reading with her littlest child on her lap. While 35 or more kids sat around reading and shell decorating, parents were hanging out the windows of the building watching and talking. Anna, a friend from El Centro, called down "Hola, Natalie. Cuando regressas al Centro?" (Hi, Natalie. When are you coming back to El Centro?)

These stories go on and on. While it is difficult to measure these achievements in concrete terms, it is clear that we had a very successful and meaningful program. LIFT was an illiteracy prevention program that crossed cultures, crossed generations and touched the lives of many people. And I also learned much from the staff, children, parents and care givers, who were often siblings no more than five years old and up. With so many single parent families, and parents who work full time, sometimes holding two jobs, an illiteracy prevention program is a vital part of a child's early years. The daycare providers and staffs I worked with have expressed on numerous occasions how valuable my input of books and crafts and stories have been to their centers and programs. They need our continued support.

Respectfully submitted,

Natalie Hinshaw,
"Roving Reader"
