ABSTRACT

"Piggybacking" is a term used to describe the interaction of educational partners such as college students and elementary school students on long-term projects. Younger students' perceptions of such cooperative learning endeavors has emerged as a useful line of inquiry for teachers. This study focused on a social studies piggybacking project between first-graders and early childhood education college students in Fitchburg, Massachusetts. A questionnaire was developed and administered to all children who participated in the piggybacking project from 1991 to 1997. Responses indicated that piggybacking had contributed to the development of a cohesive and caring learning community. (The questionnaire and responses are appended. Contains 10 references.) (EV)

"Piggybacking" is a term used to represent the working together of partners. The college student and the elementary school age child explore together during the learning process of Math, Science and Social Studies culminating with a long term project.

Students' perception of this cooperative learning atmosphere has emerged as a useful line of inquiry for teachers. This study focused on the students' perception of the elementary school age children who were learning Math, Science, and Social Studies with college students. Although there is not much known about this topic, an increase in interest on the part of educators needs to emerge. It is assumed that if a child perceives he is doing well in a subject, that in effect, will influence positively his performance in a given subject. The educator needs to be aware of the power of the child's perception of his intellectual, moral and social competencies. The ability to take perspective, the ability to work as a teammate and the ability to appreciate others requires different roles, for both the student teacher and the child.

From the data collected and analyzed, there were many advantages that are clearly documented. Piggybacking has contributed to the development of a cohesive and caring community. This has been done by breaking down ethnic, racial, age and other social barriers. Every child, by choosing their college partner is thus integrated into a social structure of this cooperative group. Students are able to work together as a team to reach a common goal. There is a helping behavior of students exhibited during this cooperative learning. When explanations were provided by a student to a peer (after a misconception) the peer learned the material better. Both partners gained from the verbalizing or demonstrating of the material.

Through this experience the college student :

- 1. learns how children invent symbols to communicate rules. Depending on the semester theme this learning occurs while the student participates in lessons in building their pig pens, ceramic patterns, circus rings, and creating their own stories.
- 2. hears the children, other college students as well as themselves during their discussions, debates, and arguments;
- 3. witnesses the child reinventing their pigpens or circus;
- 4. sees the involvement and commitment of both lasses during the process.

EL ED 3100 Math, Science and Social Studies Methods is a required course for Early Childhood majors at Fitchburg State College, located in Fitchburg, Massachusetts. A "Piggybacking" * component has been in existence for six years. At first, during the fall of 1991, students taught their lessons as if they were teaching to first graders but in reality they were only other college students. It was felt that only real interaction with a child would provide the college student with a better understanding of the dynamics involved in working with young children.

The following semester first graders chose a college partner to explore learning together. This act of choosing their partner gave power to the child, allowing the child to be the initiator in the adult-child relationship. The college students introduced themselves and directions were given to choose a college student who they personally would like to help become a great teacher. The children could be heard giving advice to their college partner, "you need to speak up," "that might be boring," "don't be afraid, you can do it" (in reference to giving their lesson), "this might be a good idea," "I think the children will really like this activity if you do it this way," "you were great!" "Awesome!" The main objective for the course is for the college student to learn how the child with whom he or she has a close relationship thinks. It allows one the opportunity to focus and truly care about a particular child over time. The college student forms a relationship with their child allowing both to be engaged with hands-on and well thought out activities. Through time college students and children collaborate and share insights by participating in and evaluating their own created and peer created lessons. These lessons focus primarily on math, science and/or a social studies component utilizing the main theme. The whole class progresses naturally.

For one and a half hours a week first or third graders and college students design lessons in Math, Science and Social Studies according to a theme. There would be three or four lessons for the children to rotate through. Each particular lesson lasts for fifteen to twenty minutes.

Themes in the past included: the first or third graders studying pigs, going to the Petting Zoo, building a pig pen, making pigs out of clay and having them fired, using the computer room, and typing their culminating story. The pigpens and their stories were displayed in front of the principal's office for all to enjoy. At the end of the semester the college students individually made a book so that each child could revisit their piggybacking experience. One semester we studied patterns by visiting Fruit lands and the children made patterns on a gray slab of clay after they designed it on paper. It was fired and painted with a creative design made into their pattern.

This learning leads the learners from concrete to abstract thinking. This long term project is further exemplified by allocating 10 dollars in credit card forms. This was given to each child to go to the store and buy materials necessary for their project. They had to keep inventory and use a calculator; they even had a rental fee for scissors and markers.

In the Spring semester we used the circus as the long term project where we constructed our circus ring and included our clay-like animals. We attended the Big Apple Circus in Boston and were actually part of the show and the intermission. At the beginning of the show, we were acknowledged by the ring master and all were informed to visit our display during intermission. We were proud. We carried our circus rings to the circus for all to see. Even after the show the famous Grandma clown actually sat on one college student's lap.

Critics of using a circus theme have stated:

The circus is not a topic to waste school time on!! It is at best frivolous, and at worst making entertainment out of animal abuse. There are far better topics for college and elementary students to end their time and energy on.

That might be true of other circuses but the Big Apple has a theme and is noted for its kind treatment of animals such as elephants, horses, and dogs. The primary interest while entertaining is to show to the audience the skills and competencies of the performers and of the hard work that goes into it.

Anmari Kicza, a college student wrote in her reflection paper:

We went to the Big Apple Circus with Mrs. Morin's first grade class. It was great, it was pleasurable and a learning experience. Previously we only knew the first graders from one sort of experience, in class. Here we got to see them in a different way, staying with them throughout the day, pairing up with one student, and on a field trip, which was new for many of them and us. Ronald (her partner) really wanted to be involved in the circus, not just watching it! It showed that he believes he is capable of the things that the adults looked at in awe, thinking that we could never do that. I think this particular circus is great because it appeals to all ages. There are parts of the show that children might like more, and parts adults might like more, but everyone can enjoy it. As I look around, I saw everyone enjoying it, and all showing it in different ways. It seemed like a quality show built around hard work and practice, rather than just glitz. That shows the soon-to-be teachers something- take care in choosing field trip sites that are quality. Also, it showed us how much work it is to take children on such an outing. It's worth it, but it's a lot of hard work. I think it was nice that we had an equal number of adults and children. It worked out well.

This was a good experience for us. Just to go to the city, see the sights and people, see how it is different and the same as where they live, is a big deal. Then they got to see a circus, which most of them previously had not. I don't think that kind of learning is quantifiable; it is wonderful learning, especially in conjunction with the circus theme at school. That makes it a total experience, rather than an isolated event. That teaches us another thing, to make field trips count for learning in real ways; use them before and after for learning in school.

The following week, the Social Studies group needed to do their lessons. Children made sense in this semester out of their circus experience. They took ownership of their own learning. There were four groups and the children choose between becoming a clown, a dog, illuminated flowers, and, of course, elephants. It was a wonderful coordinated effort among children and college students working together. They were so focused. One could see children applying clown face paint to their college partner. They were really working as teams. After making their outfits the children practiced and perfected their acts. Within forty-five minutes the fourth grade class became our audience and our room magically became our very own circus! The children had the opportunity to make sense out of their study and trip to the Big Apple. The look of pride on the college students' faces was fantastic. They finally saw how much they truly accomplished. Isaiah became the ring master in the professor's red jacket. The flowers had a strobe light on as they danced and moved around. I personally enjoyed the elephant act. During their performance I truly believe they felt like elephants. With their gray plastic bags, their elephant ears, their nylon stockings filled for the elongated nose and, of course, their tails, they were leaping over filled laundry baskets upside down while holding each others' trunks and standing on one foot in unison. What an ovation everyone received. Prior to the mini performance a good environment for thought evolved, such as what part of the circus act did the child choose, how did they want to design their costume and actually do it with the materials at hand, how did they want their face painted, reflection on their very performance, their actual dog performance, the elephants' performance, the clowns, the acrobatic flowers. The argument, checking and rechecking solutions of a particular act. As elephants, would their weight hold the inverted clothes baskets, would they be able to jump to the next basket and try again so they don't fall.

The following week was our good-bye party and the college students made beautiful books for their children to revisit this circus piggybacking experience. There was a lot of hugging and crying. It is okay to feel the loss of a positive growing experience for both the college student and child. What they have experienced was realized and can happen again for there are kind and caring adults in this world.

Procedure

A piggyback questionnaire was developed and administered to all children who remembered taking Piggybacking. The pilot questionnaire was given out in Spring 1996 to graduating fifth graders by a graduate assistant. In Spring 1997 the questionnaire was again given out by the same graduate assistant to any child who engaged in Piggybacking. The sample consisted of students enrolled in McKay Campus School located in Fitchburg, Massachusetts during 1991-1997 there were 77 completed surveys. The data was analyzed Fall semester 1997.

From the data collected and analyzed, there were many advantages that are clearly documented. An example of the data collected are illustrated in question 9a.

How did you feel about working with your partner?

- * She made me feel smart and sad, sad because when they left, smart cause of the encouragement and happy cause of the jokes.*
- * Happy, we had a lot in common.*Great, she listened to what I had to say.*

Discussion

Students perception of this cooperative learning atmosphere has emerged as a useful line of inquiry for teachers. Although there is not much known about this topic, an increase in interest on the part of educators needs to emerge. It is assumed that if a child perceives he is doing well in a subject, that, in effect, will influence positively his performance in a given subject. The educator needs to be aware of the power of the child's perception of his intellectual, moral, and social competencies. The ability to take perspective, the ability to work as a teammate and the ability to appreciate others requires different roles, for both the student teacher and the child.

Amanda, who participated in the piggybacking program while in first grade, is now in the fourth grade and wrote this to her college student partner Cara

Dear Cara,

This day, this unhappy day Brought tears to my eyes, Brought sadness to my life sad thoughts to my head. But this doesn't mean it's this end of our friendship and the little things we did together. It just means we say good-bye and let go to the people we love. And I Love You Big Sister.

Love your little sister,
Amanda

Why, as the professor, do I choose to implement a multi-generational, long-term project every semester? I believe this learning process relies on the following assumption. The activities that evolve focus on a creative vision and zeal which is based on an early commitment in allowing children from birth to work towards becoming competent, independent human beings. They are interdependent upon decent, understanding, knowledgeable, sensitive, and sensible adults who must give children the opportunity for self-reliant and self-initiated learning; an opportunity which should not be denied to college students. The college student, prior to becoming a teacher, needs to develop the ability to focus on one or two children, to see how they choose to solve a particular problem, their love of learning, and how exploration and reading leads to discovery. Learning, when a cooperative process takes place, over time results in a truly lasting effect.

The college student is going through the same experience as the child. When one is in charge of the whole class, you tend to focus on your presentation and classroom management. They might not realize how fortunate they have been to have had this experience. It was a lot of work. When they reflect about the process and progress of everyone during their own long term project, most certainly they will be in awe.

To be a facilitator to such an undertaking is very difficult. It is very difficult to change behavior. Often college students have most likely through their schooling been spoon fed and it is scary for them to take risks and be responsible for their own learning. It is so much more powerful in the end. It is much easier to take notes, study and regurgitate it back to the professor.

The college student has the right to be the initiator, to see differently, to make choices, to work together and count on each other. We are all part of the learning process. For school systems to change, they need to provide hands-on activities for the child by providing interesting, alive curriculum. We have to model and allow students the opportunity to partake and continue in the process, otherwise they will continue to perpetuate how they were taught. We now have to prepare teachers who will not fail the child. It is sad and cruel to take away from a child the desire to learn. This happens so often by providing busy work such as round-robin reading and dittos. Having the child feel hopelessness, shame and boredom has to stop! This happens when the teacher doesn't take sufficient time to observe and build from the child's competencies.

By living this learning process the true meaning of constructivism is happening. The children do realize the components of lessons that were made up of math, science, and social studies. They have been part of a nurturing, fun learning environment with the attention of one adult learning, laughing, and growing together.

Can you imagine if professors would take the risk of returning to the classroom with their college students what multi-generational learning could flourish?

Conclusion

Piggybacking has contributed to the development of a cohesive and caring community. This has been done by breaking down ethnic, racial, age and other social barriers. Every child, by choosing their college partner is thus integrated into a social structure of this cooperative group. Students are able to work together as a team to reach a common goal. There is a helping behavior of students exhibited during this cooperative learning. When explanations were provided by a student to a peer (after a misconception) the peer learned the material better. Both partners gained from the verbalizing or demonstrating of the material.

Further Research

The present study examined students' perception of this cooperative learning atmosphere. It has emerged as a useful line of inquiry for teachers. This study focused on the students' perception of the elementary school age children who were learning Math, Science, and Social Studies with college students.

It is recommended to match the math, science and social studies performance skills of the of the children involved in the study to ascertain if the child's perception of his or her academic success is equal to/and or exceeds expectation. It could be a longitudinal study examining previous test scores and post test scores to partaking in the piggybacking experience. The researcher purposely wanted to limit the initial research to the child's perception. That in itself is of great importance.

7. WHAT DO YOU REMEMBER THE MOST ABOUT PIGGYBACKING?

* Our last day of piggybacking we had a fun party

* making the pigpens and having to watch lessons from the college students

* playing games

* oohblah

* about the handshake with the college student with the shaving cream

* Journals

* the writing activity

(MB)that we got to do all sorts of activities.

and at the end of each Friday we could write in a journal

It was fun doing the pigpen(s)

I remember doing activities,

Don't remember

(MM1) Friendship, going to the circus, my partner Jen, making the circus, love Daphine, obli, I remember the oubli doing the balance bean, remember we had piggybacking partners, we go to the circus I remember the time that when I met we go to the circus

(GB3)the song, I remember going to the farm(x2) making stuff, when we went to the zoo and Susan got scared of the goats, when I built the piggybacking farm with clay, the party, the farm, when I built the piggybacking farm with clay and blocks, going on the trip and getting licked by llama, do the oohblah, that we went to a farm, when we went to eat , went to the barn or farm and we got corn and it had the animals food in it, the farm and the party

(MG5)It's fun, get to do a lot of neat stuff, it was interesting for message,foot massage,I remember having, the piggybacking shirts with the pigs,nothing, I remember that we picked famous artists and then researched on him or her and made an activity similar to their life,we did alot of art work and at the end we had a party, you learn from each other, work together,that you have to work with a partner and you do stuff with them, writing in journals, I remember when we wrote in our art journal, I remember when we went to the piggybacking farm,keeping a journal visiting to artists, stations every Friday, from one to one forty-five. when we presented our artist my presentation my partner specific activities, we spent time on how to do a project, on the last day of piggybackig in first grade we learn how to foot massage.
