ABSTRACT

This unit contains two lessons to promote commonality of culture and indicate differences as well. The first lesson asks students to explore their preconceptions about India. The second lesson is a research activity to facilitate learning about major "movers and shakers" in 20th century South Asia. Lessons include objectives, strategies, a materials list, and resources for further reading. (EH)

Enclosed are two of the three lesson plans I have completed for ERIC. I decided to utilize your materials as there is a great deal of wisdom and knowledge to be gained by both cultures. The purpose of these lessons is to promote commonality of culture while showing some differences.

The third lesson has to be delayed due to copyright requests that have not been answered, but will be forwarded as soon as I hear from the publishers of Conflict Resolution in S. E. Asia.

Thank you,
Robin Hise

Overcoming Cultural Conflict with Knowledge

Objective:

- 1) To overcome cultural conflict with knowledge of the culture to be studied.
- 2) To instil the idea that cultural difference are just that: differences; not "right" or "wrong", "good" or "bad;" just different.
- 3) To show that knowledge can enhance and enrich one's study of an area of the world.

Strategies:

- 1) Invite students to explore their preconceived ideas through the "minds eye" activity.
- 2) Introduce the Fulbright materials to the class for inspection as to the American and Indian culture.
- 3) Share results of the questionnaires given to both American and Indian students.
- 4) Have students who have been identified as "Indian students visiting America share with "American students visiting India" what they have learned about the cultures.
- 5) Have students do the In class writing after the exchange of cultural and knowledge debriefing.

Materials

- ... Questionnaire results
- ... Fulbright Materials for Americans visiting India and Indians visiting the United States.

A. Images or Stereotypes of Cultures

1. Questionnaire results of Americans going to India (hypothetically) and Indians going to America.

B. Introductory material furnished to both groups by the Fulbright House

1. Material for American scholars traveling to India
2. Material for Indian students traveling to the United States.

Lesson Plan

A. Introduction:

- 1) Ask students to close their eyes and picture what it would be like for a student from India to come to the United States. (Mind's eye activity)
 1. What would they see?
 2. What would overwhelm them?
 3. What would be so different?
 4. What difficulties would be encountered?
 - a) language b) dress c) gender d) food e) transportation
 - f) money
 5. What fears would be paramount?
- 2) Ask students to close their eyes and picture what their life would be in India as a student.
 1. What would they see?
 2. What would overwhelm them?
 3. What would be so different?
 4. What difficulties would be encountered?
 - a) language b) dress c) gender d) food e) transportation
 - f) money
 5. What fears would be paramount?

B. Introduce the Fulbright materials for both Americans and Indians traveling to the other culture.

Divide the class and half will be Indians to America, (You must spend some time telling the "Indian" students about their culture as being a largely vegetarian caste system (although outlawed) with certain mannerisms and customs they will see this from the materials.) That is their job! To see the culture from the materials prepared.

Questions to be answered by each student

1. What can you learn from these materials about both cultures?
2. What are the basic differences between these cultures?
3. How can we understand and value each other?

C. After time has been given to both groups to study materials and answer questions, have students interact and talk to each other about differences they have learned.

Final: Debriefing

D. In class Writing:

1. How much does cultural difference block understanding?
2. Why should someone study or have materials like this available prior to a trip or study of an area of the world?
3. What have you learned about cultural differences?
(using the materials; list differences to be addressed)

A. Questions given to American Students about India and the World. (given in Mt. Vernon, Ohio, Sept., 1997)

Simulation

20th Century Leader Banquet in the Subcontinent of India, Pakistan, Bangladesh and Sri Lanka.

This is a research activity to facilitate learning about the “movers and shakers” in 20th Century South Asia.

Objective:

- 1) To introduce students to the past and present influential people in an important and vital area of the world.
- 2) To enhance research abilities and interviewing skills of students
- 3) To allow students to divide into conflicting philosophies and personalities of this regions.

Strategies:

- 1) Assign each student a name on the enclosed list and aid in their research as some may be difficult to find.
- 2) Allow three days (at least) for research and questions.
- 3) Each student will prepare a paper on their person as well as note cards.
- 4) Prepare for a banquet with Indian snacks and food. There are easy recipes available in Indian cookbooks that students can prepare and bring to class. (If block scheduled, this is good, if not, allow two periods for banquet.)
- 5) Help students who wish to dress for the banquet in Saris or dhotis with enclosed diagram. Utilize Indian citizens in your community for help with food, clothing , and background music. (They love it)
- 6) Students must come to the Banquet as the person they researched. Points will be given for mingling and finding out about each other. (Writing materials are accepted as these will be informal interviews to be turned in after the Banquet. Questions should include who, what, when, where, and why)
- 7) Each student will then tell about themselves in class after the Banquet.
- 8) In class writing as final evaluation

Possible Questions:

1. What did you learn from studying the influential people of 20th Century South Asia?
2. What did you admire about your person?
3. Who were some of the personalities that “stuck out” in your mind? Why?
4. Was this a good way to learn about South Asia? Why or Why not?
