ABSTRACT

Recent proposals by President Clinton to increase the availability and affordability of child care address a major issue of concern for many parents. This Harris Poll on child care surveyed 1,000 adults between January 14 and 18, 1998. The findings indicate that: (1) about half of all adults were aware of the president's recent proposal; (2) most of the adults who had heard of the proposal supported it; (3) a quarter of all adults said that they or their partners had used or needed child care in the last 5 years, with half of these parents saying that it was extremely or very difficult to find affordable care, and 44 percent said that it was extremely or very difficult to find high quality care; (4) about half of adults who had sought child care in the last 5 years said that the lack of acceptable child care reduced their ability to do their job as well as they wanted, and 43 percent indicated that the lack of acceptable care prevented them from taking a job; (5) over 80 percent of adults responded positively to a proposal to give tax breaks to employers who offer flexible working hours or encourage telecommuting; and (6) 60 percent believe that it is primarily the families' responsibility to find child care, while 15 percent believe it is the government's responsibility and 23 percent, the employers' responsibility. (Eight tables list questions asked and detail findings.) (KB)

HARRIS POLL ON CHILD CARE

- Most people who have heard about president's proposal support it.
- Large numbers say it has been very difficult to find high quality affordable care.
- Large numbers report lack of acceptable child care prevented them from taking a job they wanted, and reduced their ability to do a job well.

by Humphrey Taylor

President Clinton's proposals to make child care more available and affordable clearly address a major issue of concern to very large numbers of parents. A quarter of all adults say they or their spouses or partners have used or needed child care in the last five years. Half (51%) of these parents say it has been extremely or very difficult to find affordable care, and almost as many (44%) say it was extremely or very difficult to find high quality care. Furthermore, half of these people say the lack of acceptable child care reduced their, or their spouse's or partner's, ability to do their job as well as they wanted to do it. And 43% say the lack of acceptable care prevented them from taking a job they wanted.

These are some of the results of a Harris Poll of 1,000 adults surveyed between January 14 and 18, 1998.

The survey also showed that only about half (51%) of all adults are aware of the president's recent proposals, but that by 67%-74%, most of these people support the proposal.

A much larger majority (87%-11%) also responded positively to a proposal to give tax breaks to employers who offer flexible working hours or encourage telecommuting for working parents.

Overall, the survey results leave no doubt that the president is addressing an issue of great importance to large numbers of working families and parents. Fully 89% of all adults believe that it is difficult for "most American families today to find affordable high quality child care," and 57% believe it is extremely or very difficult.

However, most people (60%) believe that it is primarily the families' responsibility to find child care, far more than those who believe it is primarily the government's (15%) or the employers' (23%) responsibility.

The survey findings show that the president has identified an issue for which it will be easy for him to attract strong support -- and one that Republicans who oppose him will run the risk of alienating substantial numbers of voters. As one would expect from this president, it is a shrewd political move.

Methodology

This Harris Poll was conducted by telephone within the United States between January 14 to 18, among a nationwide cross section of 1,000 adults. Figures for age, sex, race, education and number of adults in household were weighted where necessary to bring them into line with their actual proportions in the population.

In theory, with a sample of this size, one can say with 95 percent certainty that the results have a statistical precision of plus or minus 3 percentage points of what they would be if the entire adult population had been polled with complete accuracy. Unfortunately, there are several other possible sources of error in all polls or surveys that are probably more serious than theoretical calculations of sampling error. They include refusals to be interviewed (non-response), question wording and question order, interviewer bias, weighting by demographic control data and screening (e.g., for likely voters). It is difficult or impossible to quantify the errors that may result from these factors.

These statements conform to the principles of disclosure of the National Council on Public Polls.
