ABSTRACT

This paper suggests that research has shown that street youth are running from homes characterized by domestic violence, parental drug and alcohol abuse, or child abuse or neglect. This packet describes federal support for helping runaway and homeless youth and reviews implementation of the "Street Outreach Program" and best practices. Resources are provided on the range of issues that the Street Outreach Program grantees and others must address in working with street youth. The information is covered: (1) "Publications Related to Preventing the Sexual Abuse or Exploitation of Street Youth"; (2) "Street Outreach Program Grantee List"; (3) "National Clearinghouses and Resource Centers Focusing on Issues Related to Working with Street Youth"; and (4) "National Resource Organizations Focusing on Issues Related to Working with Street Youth." This paper asserts that most young people can, with the support of caring adults, deal with their past and move toward independence and adulthood. (EMK)

Introduction

Introduction

On any given night in America, there are young people living on the streets. Whether hidden in the burned-out buildings of disintegrating neighborhoods, lost in the rolling hillsides of rural America, or highly visible in urban centers, these young people are particularly vulnerable to exploitation.

They are vulnerable not just because they are living on the streets. They are vulnerable because of the factors that led them there.

Far too often, as experience and research have shown, street youth are running from homes characterized by domestic violence or excessive parental drug or alcohol use. Or they are leaving homes in which they were abused or neglected. In some cases, they are being asked or told to leave their homes by parents or guardians.

Without question, young people's sense of self-worth and value are damaged by these early encounters with adults who abuse or neglect them. Those experiences leave them vulnerable to further abuse, especially if they perceive their choices as limited to life on the streets.

Yet, despite the difficult circumstances of their early lives, these young people are not without hope or strength. Leaving their homes, in fact, may be a sign of great courage for young people who are making very difficult decisions about their own survival under extreme duress. Once on the streets, they often form "extended families" and demonstrate a compassion for others that is unfathomable given their childhoods.

This "resiliency" gives hope to efforts to reclaim street youth. Most young people, even those from the most disadvantaged circumstances, can, with the support of caring adults, deal with their pasts and move toward independence and adulthood.

Federal Support for Helping Runaway and Homeless Youth

The Family and Youth Services Bureau's (FYSB's) Runaway and Homeless Youth (RHY) Program grantees are on the front lines of community efforts to help street youth. For more than two decades, recipients of the FYSB Basic Center Program grants have conducted outreach to street youth. The programs supported by these grants offer educational materials, medical care, a hot meal, and perhaps most important, the consistent presence of caring adults. Without pressure or judgment, outreach workers from youth service agencies support young people in making the decisions to accept shelter care, assistance in returning to their families, or help in locating other places to live. The fortunate few who reside in communities with longer term care, such as the FYSB-funded Transitional Living Programs, can take advantage of services intended to help them move toward self-sufficiency, including supported housing and lessons in budgeting, employment preparation, and other life skills.

In addition, in fiscal years (FY) 1983 and 1984, FYSB awarded Research and Demonstration Program grants to a total of 10 communities to enable them to test approaches to preventing the exploitation of street youth. FYSB documented the lessons learned through those grants, and other programs working to prevent the exploitation of youth, in several publications and news articles (see "Publications Related to Preventing the Sexual Abuse or Exploitation of Street Youth," pp. 9-22).

For those reasons, when Congress enacted the Violence Against Women Act as part of the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994 ("Crime Bill") (P.L. 103-322), FYSB was selected to administer the Education and Prevention Grants To Reduce Sexual Abuse of Runaway, Homeless, and Street Youth Program, which created Grants for the Prevention of Sexual Abuse and Exploitation (Street Outreach Program). The grant program provides funding for "street-based outreach and education, including treatment, counseling, and the provision of information and referrals for runaway, homeless, and street youth who have been subjected to or are at risk of sexual abuse."

Implementing the Street Outreach Program

In July 1996, FYSB issued an invitation to current FYSB RHY Program grantees to apply for Grants for the Prevention of Sexual Abuse and Exploitation. Fifty-nine 1-year grant awards of up to $100,000 were awarded to FYSB grantees that provide emergency shelter and related services, such as survival aid, individual assessment, treatment and counseling, prevention and education activities, information and referral, crisis intervention, and followup support to runaway or homeless youth. FYSB limited the competition to agencies providing shelter to youth since the purpose of all street outreach is to build relationships with young people to move them off the streets and into services.

In FY 1997, FYSB announced that eligible applicants for funding under the Street Outreach Program would include FYSB RHY Program grantees and other private, nonprofit agencies demonstrating guaranteed access to local emergency shelter services. The Bureau subsequently awarded funding to 80 programs for up to a 3-year project period.

FYSB requires that applicants for the Street Outreach Program offer services on the street during the hours young people tend to be out, including late afternoons, evenings, nights, and weekends. The programs also must use staff whose gender, ethnicity, and life experiences are similar to those of the young people to be served. Further, given the intensity of street work, FYSB requires applicants to provide staff with supportive training on issues relevant to street life. They also must provide staff with street-based supervision, including guidance on the boundaries of their job responsibilities and strategies for helping youth who are survivors of sexual abuse.

Moreover, agencies funded under the grant program must provide outreach services from a youth development perspective; they are required to involve youth in the design, operation, and evaluation of the program. Applicants also must develop a plan for coordinating services funded under the program with their State or local sexual assault coalitions or other agencies providing services to youth who have been or who are at risk of being sexually abused or exploited.

Best Practices for Helping Street Youth

The grant projects enable FYSB to further demonstrate the value of street outreach to runaway and homeless youth to prevent their exploitation. With a limited amount of resources, the grantees show the difference that can be made in the lives of young people when caring adults reach out to them with options that might improve their immediate circumstances and their lives. Decades of experience suggest that early intervention with youth in troubled circumstances is critical. Logically, therefore, the longer young people are on the streets, the harder it is to bring them into appropriate services. The street outreach grants significantly strengthen each program's ability to provide a consistent presence in the community, with the likely result that more young people will take advantage of the services and opportunities available to them.

Moreover, while young people who have been abused, neglected, or exploited while living on the streets have special concerns, they also share the common interests and needs of all adolescents. The circumstances of their lives must be addressed through counseling and other forms of support designed to help young people recover from victimization. Group counseling with other young survivors, for example, is considered one of the best approaches to helping youth who have been the victims of sexual abuse. But these young people also need what every adolescent needs: opportunities and services that help them to develop into healthy, compassionate, productive adults.

The FYSB grant program enables local community-based agencies to demonstrate that by combining street outreach and specialized services using a developmental perspective, we can more effectively help young people in at-risk circumstances refocus their lives, accomplish their dreams, and become contributing members of the community.

Resources for Making the Most of the Street Outreach Program

FYSB, through its National Clearinghouse on Families & Youth (NCFY), therefore, developed this packet to provide resources on the range of issues that the Street Outreach Program grantees and others must address in working with street youth. The packet includes the following information:

- A bibliography of resource materials, historical and current, on topics such as street outreach, juvenile prostitution prevention, sexual abuse prevention and treatment, and youth development

- A list of the grantees to enable you to establish links with other Street Outreach Program-funded agencies
- Lists of resource organizations that deal with issues related to working with street youth
