The purpose of this paper is to present the results of a study on public relations activities of practicing school psychologists. School psychologists have been called upon to take responsibility for increasing awareness of the profession and building partnerships with potential consumers. With the Practical Strategies initiative and suggested best practices in public relations, the issue of public relations has garnered heightened interest in the National Association of School Psychologists' community. This study was conducted to investigate to what extent practitioners are engaging in these recommended activities, specifically those that target teachers, parents, and students. The importance of public relations activity was discussed, along with the suggested activities present in the literature. The purpose of this session is to present the results of a study on public relations activities of practicing school psychologists. School psychologists have been called upon to take responsibility for increasing awareness of the profession and building partnerships with potential consumers. With the Practical Strategies initiative and suggested "best practices" in public relations, the issue of public relations has garnered heightened interest in the NASP community. This study was conducted to investigate to what extent practitioners are engaging in these recommended activities, specifically those that target teachers, parents, and students. The importance of public relations activity will be discussed, along with the suggested activities present in the literature. Results of the study will also be discussed, including the activities practitioners employ, a description of the "visible" school psychologist, and participants' thoughts on the issue of public relations. Attendants will leave the session with an increased understanding of public relations/visibility raising activities and a knowledge of what current practitioners are doing on this front.

Summary

The issue of public relations in school psychology has received considerable attention in the NASP community with the "Practical Strategies for Expanding Services to Children and Families" initiative (Thomas, Pluymert, & Armistead, 1998). School psychologists have been called upon to take responsibility for increasing awareness of their profession and building partnerships with potential consumers. Raising visibility is important not only for role expansion opportunities, but also for developing increasingly successful partnerships with other professionals (Baas, 2000).

Kelly (1995) has also written on the need for public relations at the building-level for school psychologists. By communicating their role to potential consumers of psychological services, school psychologists raise knowledge of what they currently do and can do to serve children. Teachers, parents, and students are three major groups that school psychologists must connect with to maximize effective service delivery.

Much research has been done concerning the amount of time school psychologists spend in more traditional activities such as testing, counseling, consultation, paperwork, etc. (reviewed in Fagan & Wise, 2000). However, no research was found concerning what public relations/visibility raising activities practitioners employ or how often they do so. The purpose of this session is to fill this gap by presenting the results of a study on public relations activities of practicing school psychologists.

This study was conducted to investigate to what extent practitioners are engaging in the recommended "best practices" and "practical strategies" in PR, specifically those that target teachers, parents, and students. To accomplish this goal, a questionnaire was developed based on the recommended practices of Kelly (1995) and Thomas, Pluymert, & Armistead (1998). It was then mailed to a total of 305 members of four regional school psychology associations in Ohio. The return rate was near 50%.

Results of the study indicate that time is a major factor in the ability or willingness of school psychologists to engage in public relations activities. While some activities that are rarely employed do involve a time commitment (e.g., writing an article for the teacher association newsletter), others do not (e.g., sending a student a congratulations note for an accomplishment). Overall, practitioners target teachers the most, followed by parents, then students.

High public relations activity was associated with state and international school psychology association memberships, specifically directed toward parents. It is likely that practitioners who are involved in their schools are involved outside of their schools as well. Practitioners who serve junior high/middle schools or high schools had lower PR activity than those who did not, specifically in regard to teachers. Psychologists working in suburban and urban districts had higher PR activity than those working in rural districts. This may be related to school psychologist to student ratios, as lower ratios are associated with higher PR activity and rural school psychologists had higher ratios.

Practitioners who reported high PR activity were more likely to report being satisfied with that activity, suggesting that those with low PR activity may wish to do more. The most common reason respondents reported doing PR was desire. Furthermore, those doing PR due to desire or consumer appreciation had higher PR activity. Those doing PR because they were required to had lower PR activity. Having not enough time was the most frequently given reason for not engaging in PR activities. Respondents also reported believing PR is important, helps to educate others about their roles and functions, and makes them more accessible and approachable.

Future research may address the effects of engaging in these PR activities, both from a consumer and school psychologist perspective. Further information on personal and job characteristics that are related to higher public relations activity and ways to make it possible for school psychologists to employ more of these activities, are interesting areas open for exploration.
