Fact Sheet Model Program Evaluations

There are probably thousands of programs and courses intended to prevent or reduce violence in our nation's schools. They may range from one teacher's efforts in one classroom to nationwide programs with substantial federal funding. Likewise, their effectiveness may range from mere window-dressing to significant improvement in the lives and well being of children.

Evaluating these many programs has become a problem or goal in itself. There are now many evaluation programs, with many levels of designations, such as model, promising, best practice, exemplary and noteworthy. "Model program" is the term most often applied, and it has come to have a life of its own.

The initial effort here has been to select evaluation programs and to list some of those programs they have chosen. The ones chosen here have in common substantial funding from major stakeholders, such as the U.S. Department of Justice, especially the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (OJJDP), the U.S. Department of Education, and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. An additional criterion for selection was the frequency of their citation by other users as measured by search engine references.

The evaluation programs considered here generated a list of more than 150 outstanding programs. Nearly one-third of these programs were cited by more than one evaluation program. For this list such multiple designation was the only standard for inclusion. (For this paper there has been no effort to examine evaluation criteria.)

While many of the programs listed focus on ancillary problems such as drug abuse, these problems are considered to be root or contributing causes to many episodes of school violence. Indeed, it is most common to find the issues of violence or aggression, delinquency, and substance abuse linked firmly to each other. Likewise, these programs address many ages and communities.
