school at least sixteen weeks each year. The moral effect of this legislation has been salutary in causing some pupils to attend who would otherwise have absented themselves. The full effect of the law can not be seen so long as the school census has not been taken. In accordance with the opinion of the attorney-general this census is first to be taken in connection with the spring assessment of 1896.

The following table gives the salient particulars of the compulsory laws in twenty-eight States and Territories of the Union, together with the date of the law now in force, and in a few cases the date of subsequent amendments. To this is appended a tabular statement of the conditions of compulsory school attendance in foreign countries, as given in the report of the royal commission appointed to inquire into the working of the elementary education acts, England and Wales, 1888, Foreign Returns.

AMERICAN STUDENTS IN FOREIGN UNIVERSITIES.

Americans intending to pursue a course of higher education in Europe chiefly attend German and Swiss universities. Comparatively few attend French and English institutions of learning, but for art studies they naturally prefer the French schools to the German, while for technical branches the German and English schools are preferred. Admission to German universities being dependent upon a course of preparation in a German classical secondary school (so-called gymnasia), Americans are rarely matriculated as regular students, but as hearers who have all the privileges of regular students, except that they are barred from state examinations which open the way to the learned professions in Germany. The French authorities propose to draw the current of American students to France.¹ In Paris a committee of the Sorbonne are active in calling the attention of Americans to the advantages offered in France. They particularly dwell on the fact that admission to schools of learning in France for foreigners is facilitated. Lately a committee has been organized in Washington working to the same end. However, several journals in the United States advocate the continuance of the practice in vogue, urging that the German language is acquired more easily, hence that an American can more easily familiarize himself with the working of a German university, and, furthermore, that the German university is a complete institution, while a French provincial university is rarely composed of more than one or two faculties. The following figures may be of interest:

CONTINUATION AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS.

In Germany, it is well understood that an elementary education, such as the common school offers, barely suffices to prepare for the duties of life the children of the poorer strata of society. The time between the fourteenth and, say, eighteenth years of life is a period during which the children are apt to forget what they learned in school, not having immediate application of their knowledge in daily pursuits. The various state and communal governments of Germany, Austria, Switzerland, and some other States in Europe having recognized the necessity of bridging over that period, established what is known as "continuation of supplementary schools." These schools are either day, evening, or Sunday schools. In most cases they offer reviews of elementary branches, and in addition to these a number of generally useful branches of practical knowledge, such as drawing and manual labor. When they offer this manual instruction, which is also called instruction in trades sometimes, these schools are classed among the industrial schools. If they have no such addition, and confine themselves to the common school branches, they are called continuation schools only.

In industrial centers, such as Saxony, Thuringia, and Rhenish Prussia, as well as in large cities with extensive industries, these continuation schools are most generally industrial schools also, and are specially designed to give opportunities to apprentices in workshops and factories to prepare themselves better for their pursuits than they could otherwise, and the parental governments in central Europe are very much concerned about apprentices and the thorough preparation of skilled labor. They even prescribe for the boys a compulsory attendance in these evening or Sunday schools. The State law gives communities the right to insist upon a compulsory attendance where ample provision is made, and where the State gives a subsidy for the maintenance of such schools. It is the rule, generally accepted in all German-speaking nations, that the community establishes the school—that is to say, furnishes the house and equipments, light and fuel, as well as furniture and tools, and the State pays the salary of the teacher. Thus communities and government join hands in maintaining a vast system of supplementary schools chiefly designed to prevent the deterioration of the elementary common school work, and secondly to facilitate and aid industries in the city and in the country, for these schools are not industrial schools only but also agricultural, many of them being situated in agricultural districts.

Now, it must not be understood that any of the supplementary or continuation schools and industrial and agricultural schools, as they are called, are anything more than elementary. The real and actual trade schools are of a higher order. These latter schools presuppose a thorough common school education, and build upon that by introducing higher arithmetic, business methods, a great deal of industrial drawing, and the elements of certain trades. These trades are not chosen by the State authority; but they are invariably the choice of authorities of the community or of certain societies, the aim of which is to encourage trade and industry. Many of such schools are therefore established by trades union. Afterwards they were adopted, as it were, by the city or communal government, and as such came under the State law which provides for the State aid or subsidies.

Though these schools are primarily established and maintained for boys, it must be stated that during the last twenty years the fact that women are employed in various industries in factory and shop work makes it necessary to extend the benefits of continuation and industrial schools to girls also. But the Germans recognize the fact that woman's skill lies in different directions from that of man's skill, and they therefore aim to meet the several necessities of woman's skill in school work by carefully discriminating between shopwork for boys and for girls. In the models used in drawing, for instance, it is plainly seen that a thoughtful discrimination is made. The same is done with reference to the work in arithmetic and in commercial branches.

In some portions of the Empire the continuation schools are very old, having begun shortly after the general revival following in the wake of the dethronement of Napoleon I. In other parts of the Empire, as well as in Austria and Switzerland, and notably in the agricultural districts, the continuation schools are of more recent origin. Their attendance is not at all uniformly regular, owing to the fact that attendance is not everywhere compulsory, and owing also to the fact that the skill and popularity of the teacher has much to do with the attendance at a school for boys and girls in the critical age between 14 and 18. It is well understood that this period is a time of storm and stress, and subjugation under strict rules and discipline in that age is more difficult with children of the lower strata of society than it is found in higher schools and colleges, where a higher culture and a more refined atmosphere aids the discipline and the general habitus of the students. In paragraph 3 of chapter on "Education in Central Europe," in this annual report, an extensive article on the subject of supplementary schools is found. It contains some statistics which show the extent of the system.
