♦ "[M]any readers today have reached adulthood in educational institutions where a generalized sense of helplessness and acute anxiety have become the norm. In these institutions, young people are increasingly encouraged to see themselves not as agents in life but as potential victims: of their dates, their roommates, their professors, of institutions and of history in general. In a culture where victimhood has become a claim to status, how could Yanagihara's book—with its unending parade of aesthetically gratuitous scenes of punitive and humiliating violence—not provide a kind of comfort? To such readers, the ugliness of this author's subject must bring a kind of pleasure, confirming their preexisting view of the world as a site of victimization—and little else." ("A Whole Lotta Pain" by Daniel Mendelsohn, The New York Review of Books, December 3, 2015, and included in Mendelsohn's book Ecstasy And Terror: From the Greeks to Game Of Thrones.)

♦ “When I was young, I didn’t really have the vocabulary to articulate how I felt about it... But music has always been a tool for me to express feelings I fear would be unacceptable... (NoSo / Abby Hwang about being trans / queer / nonbinary.)

♦ “Before (roller) derby, I knew I was on the spectrum of queer and pansexual, but I didn’t have the language or support until I met my derby mates who genuinely wanted to see me become my best self. My derby league was the first place I asked people to use they/them pronouns for me.” (Lauren Macadaeg.)

♦ “I couldn’t verbalise what I was feeling before and I didn’t have the right language to articulate how I was feeling before that... / “I’m really open for my team-mates wanting to talk to me. I wasn’t taught throughout the course of my life what it meant to be trans, all the language around it. I think that’s something that’s new for a lot of people.” (“Quinn: Canada’s transgender footballer on being ‘visible’ and playing at the Olympics” by Katie Gornall & Katie Falkingham, BBC Sport, 23 September 2020.)

♦ “I mean I think back to like just being pretty confused about what I was experiencing (upspeak). When I first tried to explain my identity, I was talking to my sister, and we just like tried, we were like, well, that means you’re a lesbian, like I’m pretty sure, that kinda lines up, and it’s like, we were looking for the only words that we had. / It’s really hard to articulate what’s going on if you don’t have words for it (upspeak). It took a long time for me to even know that there were people who were non-binary, to know that I wasn’t the only person in the world that had my gender identity (upspeak). (One Climber’s Story. They / Them film and panel. Lor Sabourin.)

♦ “When the words finally came, and Willow could express herself in saying she wanted to present as a girl...” (The mother of a young transgender girl.)

♦ “I was incapable of articulating the depth of pain I was in.” (The actor Elliot Page.)

♦ “I was fifteen, I was fifteen years old when I read my first diverse book, Maya Angelou’s I Know Why The Caged Bird Sings. And the whole world fell away from me. It was the first book [wagging her finger] at fifteen I ever read with a Black protagonist. That book gave a voice to my silences, my secrets, it gave words to my pain, and my confusion of being raped at nine years old. Until Caged Bird, I didn’t know that there was a language, there were words, for what had happened to me or that any other human being on earth had experienced it...” (Oprah Winfrey on stage at the 74th annual National Book Awards.)

♦ Terry Gross: So, talk a little bit about how you wish your mother had been...had had a language and the ideas to have more control of her life and to broaden her life... (Terry Gross speaking to the historian Drew Gilpin Faust about the latter’s mother. It is an oddly specific question and Faust’s reply is an utter disconnect.)

♦ “Gwyneth Paltrow and Body Vibes didn’t know how to develop the vocabulary of their marketing.” (Richard Eaton, president of AlphaBio Centrix, a stress-patch company. Eaton is a believer in the Rife machine.)

♦ The notion of “lacking language or vocabulary” to understand feelings is a popular LGBTQ trope. Type in “have the vocabulary” at NPR and you get 23 results and counting.

♦ “When one walks through the streets...[o]ne sees so many people who for different reasons have deviated from all that is natural and so have lost their real and inward life... for in the evening one sees all kinds of black figures wandering around, of men as well as of women, in whom the terror of the night is personified, and whose misery one must range among the things that have no name in any language.” (Dear Theo: The Autobiography of Vincent Van Gogh, Edited by Irving and Jean Stone.)

♦ “Just as our hunger is not that feeling of missing a meal, so our way of being cold has need of a new word. We say ‘hunger,’ we say ‘tiredness,’ ‘fear,’ ‘pain,’ we say ‘winter’ and they are different things. They are free words, created and used by free men who lived in comfort and suffering in their homes. If the Lagers had lasted longer a new, harsh language would have been born; and only this language could express what it means to toil the whole day in the wind, with the temperature below freezing, wearing only a shirt, underpants, cloth jacket and trousers, and in one’s body nothing but weakness, hunger and knowledge of the end drawing nearer.” (If This Is A Man by Primo Levi, Chapter 13, “October 1944.”)

♦ “The mental adjustment took longer. It was a continual surprise to encounter no queues at food shops—‘like a man who braces himself to pick up a heavy suitcase,’ wrote Ginzburg, ‘and finds it empty.’ The words ‘I’m hungry,’ recently so charged with desperation and despair, only slowly reverted to their old function of expressing an ordinary desire for lunch.” (Leningrad by the great writer Anna Reid.)

♦ “We lack the vocabulary of such pain.” (U.S. Attorney Raj Parekh speaking about the grotesque crimes of El Shafee Elsheikh, an ISIS “Beatle.” Presumably, Parekh is referring to Dante’s Inferno, Canto XXVIII 3-5.)

- ◆ "Do you know the stigmatism of Alabama education?" (Kayvon Thibodaux, NFL football player.)
- ◆ "He showed off his wrist full of friendship bracelets." (The New York Post.)
- ◆ "Kyler is his own individual. He's his own person, he beats to his own drum." (One NFL player about his quarterback. "Marches to the beat of...?")
- ◆ "The protesters' roarious chants filled the streets." ("Roarious"?! It sounds like a word that might have been included in Lewis Carroll's "Jabberwocky"!)
- ◆ "I'm like, what are you talking about? People garnish things from a game and have their own opinions... Some stuff is worth conversation, other stuff is like, alright, alright, alright." (An NFL football player, responding to criticism of a gesture he made after a play was completed. Garner? Glean? Collect? Notice?)
- ◆ "She watched the shwerm (rhymes with "worm") of police." (A person who witnessed the police arrive at a school where a school-shooting had been reported. Presumably the reporter on NPR meant "swarm.")
- ◆ "Cow-towing to the woke cancel culture mob is pathetic." (An article from The New York Post. Presumably "kowtowing.")
- ◆ "Sadly we did see some of those family members come out of the reunification site audibly shaken and audibly upset..." (A local female reporter about a shooting at a Virginia Walmart, heard audibly on NPR.)
- ◆ "Kohberger was arrested on Dec. 30 in his home state of Pennsylvania in connection to the quadruple murders that captivated [italics mine] the nation." (Emily Shapiro, ABC News, Jan 12, 2023. Horrified? Shocked? Grippid?)
- ◆ "Language models can just wholecloth make things up." (ChatGPT, etc.)
- ◆ "They are not wholecloth falsehoods [with upspeak] but they reassemble things that are true or close to being true into stories that are just wildly and completely different from what actually happened."
- ◆ "The fact that she had pro-police social media posts, and her late father had worked as a police officer only seemed to irate people more." (Morgan Bettinger at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville.)
- ◆ Original photo caption: "Snow piles on vehicles before their owners clear them off on Thursday in central Lincoln." ABC photo caption via AP: "Vehicles are stacked with snow are seen [sic] before their owners clear them on Thursday, Feb. 16, 2023, in Lincoln, Neb."
- ◆ "Other videos showed an officer shoving a man who had his hands up to the ground and kicking him in the groin [sic]." (ABC news. An eggcorn? Funny!)
- ◆ "Rikers Island inmate found dead for 7th time this year."
- ◆ "Standing at just 5ft 2in, Ball gave away six inches of height to his opponent and was at a significant reach advantage." (The BBC.) / An online commenter posted: I see the proof readers are on strike again! If you picture it, it's funny!
- ◆ "Marine injured [italics mine] in Kabul airport blast says..." (He lost his right arm and a leg to a suicide bomber.)
- ◆ "Wounds [italics mine] indicated she had jumped or fallen." (A female student who committed suicide at New York University.)
- ◆ This sort of language has many possible explanations.

language: vocabulary

vocal fry (contempo-speak)

- ◆ "The best example of this is from the journalist Sarah Koenig, and you can hear her going from being in her thirties to being in her forties, over the 21st century, actually developing this vocal fry manner of speaking." (John H. McWhorter of Columbia University, on his Slate podcast Lexicon Valley.)

◆ Rachel Syme, in "Feeling Better Now?" (The New Yorker), describes a podcast host "affecting a high-pitched tone dusted with vocal fry." The important word is "affecting."

◆ People (mainly women) who use upspeak, baby talk and vocal fry are widely considered hesitant and weak, and their language is considered affected and irritating. The matter has been widely discussed and needs no comment from me. NPR's Selena Simmons-Duffin's "Talking While Female" animation (2014), and the comments relating to it, say everything that needs to be said. The issue has been settled: listen to the two Fresh Air Terry Gross episodes about the matter. The first was critical, the second was essentially a retraction. The consensus is, it is wrong to criticize or judge these things.

◆ A CURIOUS CASE. "Exploring how content creators speak on TikTok—it's known as influencer speak," NPR, January 31, 2024, now redirects to "Do you have 'TikTok voice'? It's OK if you don't want to get rid of it" by Claire Murashima, Leila Fadel, and Steve Inskip, NPR, Updated on Morning Edition, February 1, 2024. The transcript does not match the audio. Mmmm... The audio is funny and good. I suspect that the original story was controversial at NPR.

♦ "Hagfish are the vultures of the abyss, feeding on carcasses of dead fish."

♦ "In this great city (Calcutta)...vast areas were dark with ruin and black with the wings of vultures that hovered impartially over the Hindu and Muslim dead..." (Halfway to Freedom by Margaret Bourke-White.)

♦ "The deceased was an eleven-year-old girl who had died from a ruptured liver after being thrown from a horse. A priest in an apron laid the corpse on a stone and began cutting away. Now standing, now squatting, he wielded hatchet and knives with practiced hands... [The] birds swarmed to their dinner table. The feast began... This was the sky burial... To Tibetans this is natural and right." (An eyewitness account by the great photojournalist Kazuyoshi Momachi of a sky burial, from his wonderful book Pilgrimage.)

♦ In the film Mountain Patrol: Kekexili, the reporter Ga Yu and Ritai first notice one another and lock eyes at the sky burial for a patrolman murdered by poachers. It is an unforgettable moment in a great film.

♦ "Towers of Silence, such as this one in Chilpyk, Uzbekistan, are where Zoroastrians would leave the bodies of the dead to be consumed by birds."

♦ "We have an unusual method of disposal of the dead. The Parsi corpse is exposed to the rays of the sun and the corpse is consumed or devoured by birds of prey: vultures, kites and crows." (Khojeste Mistree, a Parsi in Mumbai.)

♦ "There were far-going Arab dhows on the pearly waters, and gaily dressed Parsees wading out to worship the sunset. Of their creed I knew nothing, nor did I know that near our little house on the Bombay Esplanade were the Towers of Silence, where their Dead are exposed to the waiting vultures on the rim of the towers, who scuffle and spread wings when they see the bearers of the Dead below. I did not understand my mother's distress when she found 'a child's hand' in our garden, and said I was not to ask questions about it. I wanted to see that child's hand." (Something of Myself by Rudyard Kipling, which he wrote "Looking back from this my seventieth year." At the time, he was a boy of perhaps four, in 1869.)

♦ "After being properly necklaced, according to custom, with great garlands made of yellow flowers, and provided with betel-nut to chew, this pleasant visit closed, and we passed then to a scene of a different sort: from this glow of color and this sunny life to those grim receptacles of the Parsee dead, the Towers of Silence. There is something stately about that name, and an impressiveness which sinks deep; the hush of death is in it. We have the Grave, the Tomb, the Mausoleum, God's Acre, the Cemetery; and association has made them eloquent with solemn meaning; but we have no name that is so majestic as that one, or lingers up on the ear with such deep and haunting pathos. / On lofty ground, in the midst of a paradise of tropical foliage and flowers, remote from the world and its turmoil and noise, they stood—the Towers of Silence; and away below was spread the wide groves of cocoa palms, then the city, mile on mile, then the ocean with its fleets of creeping ships all steeped in a stillness as deep as the hush that hallowed this high place of the dead. The vultures were there..." (Following the Equator: A Journey Around the World by Mark Twain. When he visited Bombay in 1895, he was an old man of 60.)

even know you. So, just think of it like that. They're firing bullets, whatever, but they don't know you, so don't take it personally." (Elon Musk talking to Joe Rogan.)

◆ "Take an old broomstick, and to one end nail a slim triangle of wood, suitably whittled; you than have a Kentucky rifle, as good as anything Daniel Boone had... All you have to do is crook your finger and say, 'Bang!' loudly, and you have killed a moose, or a grizzly bear, or a redskin. / If you preferred to be an Indian the same shooting iron would serve. There were enough dead sticks lying around in the woodlot to build a wigwam... As an Indian, of course, you were never shot by Daniel Boone; instead, you shot him, and with a wooden knife whittled out of any stray piece of a packing box you could dash in and lift his scalp. / A pal sometimes joined me in this game, and we found that it was best if we were both on the same side—that is, each of us was an Indian, or each was a frontiersman, and our foes were wholly imaginary. Splitting up, and hunting each other, usually led to arguments about who had really shot whom, and the game was likely to break up in a row. Also, it was easier to scalp a victim who did not really exist than it was to scalp a living, active small boy. He was apt to complain that you pulled his hair too hard, and there was always the danger of sticking a wooden scalping knife in his eye. On the whole, it was better to be Indians than to be frontiersmen; we had an excuse to yell, giving the blood-curdling war whoop, and off in the woods there were no adults to lean out of windows and tell us we were making too much noise. We had the world to ourselves." (Waiting for the Morning Train: An American Boyhood by Bruce Catton.)

◆ "The object of the Germans in making Zeppelin raids on London was to produce panic and a cry for peace. It did neither... / But while there was no panic there were great hardships, as a visit to any of the Tube stations in the East of London on the night of an air-raid would have shown—the stairs crowded with half-awakened and hungry children, the platforms so packed with humanity that there was not a vacant square foot. I used to wonder how many of these children would feel the permanent effects. On the whole, however, young children between five and thirteen really seemed to enjoy air-raid nights. They were full of excitement, and you would take them out of bed wrapped in blankets and give them unexpected meals. It was a little grim when one knew the reality to hear from infant lips, 'Oh, Daddy, I do hope there'll be an air-raid to-night.'" (Queer People by Basil Thomson, head of the Criminal Investigation Department at Scotland Yard.)

♦ "When I was born in Munich only two weeks later a bomb hit the house next to us and our place was half destroyed and my mother discovered me—the baby—under a foot of shards of glass and debris. But I was unhurt but my mother fled to the remotest mountain valley in Bavaria and we got stuck there... [I]t was occupied by sixty Americans at the very end of the war... And sixty Americans moved in in jeeps, and they were totally relaxed, chewing gum, and I had the feeling this was all the Americans of the world and for the first time I saw a black man. And I was totally mesmerized by seeing him because I had only heard about black people in fairy tales. And I immediately became friends with him and talked to him for hours... [O]nly when I was eleven and the war was well over I saw destroyed cities and bombed out places and I developed a concept of what must have happened... [I]t's strange because everybody thinks that German children who grew up in the post-war time had a terrible childhood. On the contrary, nobody was frightened. All my school friends who grew up in the cities, they were...are delirious about speaking of this time when they grew up in ruins and it was pure anarchy in the best sense of the word. There were no fathers around to tell them what to do and how to do things, they would be the masters and the kings of let's say a whole block that was bombed out and it was a most wonderful playground for children... [T]he childhood of practically all the children who grew up in the post-war time was wonderful, as strange and as paradoxical as it may sound... ("Werner Herzog on the Story Behind 'Rescue Dawn,'" NPR, Fresh Air, July 6, 2007. Herzog was born in 1942.)

♦ "The Second World War was one of the most horrific events of the 20th century. But for me, it was one of the greatest things. It meant evacuation, escape from the Blitz with my brother and mother, the second time around. We were transported from smoke-choked London to the bliss of the Norfolk countryside, where I could run around in the fresh air and nick apples and have a massive cart-horse as a pet. There was very little sugar, no sweets, but free orange juice, cod-liver oil and vitamins. For most people, rationing was terrible, but for people like me, the wartime diet was a great improvement. My rickets were cured, and I shot up, like a weed. Because of the war, I got the opportunity to take the eleven plus exam, to get a place at grammar school. Very unusual for a boy from my background. My father survived Dunkirk, El Alamein, and the liberation of Rome, and came back tired, sadder, but a daily reminder of how lucky we were. The telegram we had dreaded every day of the war had never arrived, and when I came back to London after the war, twelve years old, still lanky, but now six feet tall, we were re-housed in a pre-fab... It had electric lights, hot water, a proper bath, a refrigerator, an inside toilet. These were all firsts for us, and it felt like luxury." ♦ "Meade wrote orders for Sheridan and his ten thousand horsemen to ride past the rear of Lee's army, drive toward Richmond, and harass the enemy... Now Sheridan issued a full-scale challenge to Stuart's cavalry. For the next sixteen days, detached from the Army of the Potomac, Sheridan, with matchless gusto, played havoc with Lee's army, even penetrating Richmond's outer defenses... On May 11 [1864], at Yellow Tavern near Richmond, Sheridan's men routed Confederate cavalry under Stuart, who was mortally wounded, robbing Lee of a premier lieutenant. A flamboyant figure partial to ostrich-plumed hats and scarlet-lined capes in battle, James E. B. Stuart was an inspired warrior whom the South couldn't afford to lose. Upon hearing of his death, Lee fought off tears... Earlier in the war, the Confederate cavalry had been preeminent but now, thanks to [Sheridan], the Union cavalry matched and overtook it." (Grant by Ron Chernow.)

♦ "On Sept. 19, 1862, just two days after the Battle of Antietam, Alexander Gardner, an employee of the photographer Mathew Brady, began documenting the battle's grim aftermath. One of Gardner's photographs, titled 'Dead Horse of Confederate Colonel: both killed at Battle of Antietam,' depicted a milky-white steed lying on the field in an eerily peaceful repose...[The Horse] very likely belonged to Colonel Strong, and it became something of a landmark among the Union soldiers left on the field because of its strangely peaceful appearance. Gen. Alpheus Williams wrote, 'The number of dead horses was high. They lay, like the men, in all attitudes. One beautiful milk-white animal had died in so graceful a position that I wished for its photograph. Its legs were doubled under and its arched neck gracefully turned to one side, as if looking back to the ball-hole in its side. Until you got to it, it was hard to believe the horse was dead.' / Oliver Wendell Holmes Sr. saw the horse four days after the battle while searching for his wounded son. Later, Holmes examined Gardner's photograph and said it was the same horse." ("The Dead of Antietam," by Terry L. Jones, The New York Times, September 24, 2012.)

♦ "The wounded were, many of them, placed in the Chancellorsville mansion... The Confederates got exact range of the building, and in a short time the location became 'very hot.' As Gen. Hooker stood on the porch, a cannon-ball struck the pillar against which he was leaning at the time, and the violent concussion so stunned him that he fell to the floor... Still another came and struck a poor soldier who was quenching his thirst at the well near the building. We were unwilling to leave the wounded, and while we were in a dilemma as to what was best to do, another ball came and struck the fore-leg of a beautiful bay horse belonging to an officer on Gen. Hooker's staff. It smashed the entire leg from the breast to the hoof. The poor horse jerked back, broke the halter-strap, fell on his back, then recovered himself, arose and hobbled away on three legs, dangling the hoof of the fourth leg, which was held suspended by a strip of skin. This strip of skin, about two inches wide, and the hoof were all that remained of the fore-leg. Blood flowed profusely and streaked the ground wherever he passed. He was soon shot and put out of pain. I hardly remember a sight that touched my heart so keenly during the entire battle. The innocent animal had no part in the fight, but he was a silent victim." (Chancellorsville. From Memoirs of Chaplain Life by W. Corby.)

♦ "Comanche was known as the sole survivor of the General George Custer's command at the Battle of the Little Bighorn on June 25, 1876. A mustang captured as a wild horse and gelded, he became the favorite mount of Captain Myles Keogh of the 7th Cavalry. He saw frequent action and sustained some 12 wounds. A burial party found him severely wounded on the battleground and transported him by steamer to Fort Lincoln, 950 miles away, where he spent the next year recuperating. He was never again to be ridden, and orders excused him from all duties. Most of the time he freely roamed the Post and flower gardens. At formal regimental functions he was led, draped in black, stirrups and boots reversed, at the head of the Regiment. When the Cavalry was ordered to Fort Riley, Kansas, in 1888, Comanche, aging but still in good health, accompanied them and continued to receive full honors as a symbol of the tragedy at Little Bighorn. Finally, on November 7, 1891, about 29 years old, Comanche died of colic." (The Smithsonian Institute.)

♦ "It is estimated that 16 million animals served during the First World War, and by 1916 alone the warring nations had raised 103 cavalry divisions with over a million horses."

♦ Of the 14 ships [chartered by the Army to carry AEF troops to France at the start of the war], 10 were designated to carry human passengers, while 4 were designated as animal ships. Animal ships carried horses and mules, up to 500 at a time. The ships were generally cargo ships that had to be modified with ramps and stalls. There was initially a great mortality rate of up to four percent for the horses and mules. But then the military began transporting veterinarians and veterinary detachments with the animals, and the mortality rates dropped, sometime to zero percent. The crossing could take up to 22 days. One such ship was the SS El Oriente. At the end of the war, it was refitted to carry troops home. Other animal ships were the El Occidente and El Sol.

♦ "Every British officer understood animals, as a point of honor." (Seven Pillars of Wisdom, Book VIII, Chapter XCV by T.E. Lawrence.)

♦ "Almost two hundred horses lay on the ground in their death throes, or fled in all possible directions, maddened by pain and with blood spurting from their dangling guts. Any riders whose feet had been caught in the stirrups were dragged with them and any soldiers foolish enough to try to stop them were trampled under their hooves." (Rafael de Nogales at the Second Battle of Gaza in April 1917. His tightly packed cavalry division has been bombed by six or seven British biplanes. From The Beauty and the Sorrow by Peter Englund.)

♦ "They have been slaughtering the draught animals and the mules for some time but they have consciously been sparing the riding animals. That is no longer possible. Another attempt to relieve them has run into the sand and orders have now been given that the last horses will have to be slaughtered in order to feed the besieged garrison, which will soon be starving. / [Edward] Mousley tears up some fresh grass and goes to where the horses are lined up. His own horse, Don Juan, obviously recognises his owner and welcomes him eagerly in the way he has taught the horse to do. Mousley feeds him the grass. / Then the slaughter begins. / A non-commissioned officer shoots the horses. There is the crack of a gunshot and one by one the big, heavy animals crumple to the ground. The blood flows. At first Mousley watches, noting that the horses follow the proceedings, trembling as they wait their turn. Like the other horses Don Juan stamps uneasily but otherwise remains quite still. When it is almost Don Juan's turn Mousley can watch no longer; he asks the man with the gun to take careful aim and to tell him when it is all over. Then he kisses the horse's cheek and walks away. He can see how the horse turns and watches him go. / Then there is another crack from the gun. / His dinner that evening is Don Juan's heart and kidneys. (These parts of the horse are always reserved for the owner—Mousley has also kept Don Juan's black tail.) Admittedly it feels strange, but he does not think there is anything wrong about it. He writes in his diary: 'I am sure he would have preferred that I, rather than another, should do so.'" (The Beauty and the Sorrow by Peter Englund. The place is Kut al-Amara, Mesopotamia, 10 April 1916.)

♦ Germany's invasion of Russia on June 22, 1941, was the largest invasion in military history, involving perhaps 4 million troops. According to the Wikipedia entry for "Operation Barbarossa," the invasion included about 600,000 motor vehicles... and over 625,000-700,000 horses for non-combat operations.

♦ "The first Russian patrol came in sight of the camp about midday on 27 January 1945. Charles and I were the first to see them: we were carrying Somogyi's body to the common grave, the first of our room mates to die. We tipped the stretcher on to the defiled snow, as the pit was now full, and no other grave was at hand: Charles took off his beret as a salute to both the living and the dead. / They were four young soldiers on horseback, who advanced along the road that marked the limits of the camp, cautiously holding their sten-guns. When they reached the barbed wire, they stopped to look, exchanging a few timid words, and throwing strangely embarrassed glances at the sprawling bodies, at the battered huts and at us few still alive..." (The Truce by Primo Levi.)

♦ "The various SF teams that were in Afghanistan or would soon arrive split into smaller three-man and six-man cells to cover more ground. Some of them quickly found themselves on borrowed horses, in saddles meant for Afghans much lighter and shorter than American Green Berets. Most had never ridden before, and they learned by immediately riding for hours, forced to keep up with skilled Afghan horsemen..." ("First to go: Green Berets remember earliest mission in Afghanistan" by Elizabeth M. Collins, U.S. Army, army.mil, February 8, 2017. Those soldiers arrived in Afghanistan immediately after 9/11 and embedded with the Northern Alliance and the great Ahmad Shah Massoud, the Lion of the Panjshir.)

("The College's ratio of students to mental health providers is abysmal and it shows" by Anna Roodnitsky, The Dartmouth, 22 July 2022. It's an interesting conceit to consider, and Anna gets some of it right. Actual ducks, when frightened, do appear calm but can be seen to paddle harder, seemingly to gain the momentum necessary to take flight. But do ducks paddle to keep from drowning? I just highlighted "do ducks paddle to keep from drowning?" right-clicked, clicked search, and was astonished to discover the article, "The New Duck Metaphor | The Stanford Daily." It's a wonderful opinion by Adam Johnson who had the same question I had and answered it. Interestingly, it was datelined September 26, 2012, ten years before Roodnitsky's article. In their 2015 paper, ‘Reimagining Critical Race Theory in Education: Mental Health, Healing and the Pathway to Liberatory Praxis,’ Ebony O. McGee, a professor at Vanderbilt University, and David Stovall, a professor at the University of Illinois at Chicago, found that black college students who weather the effects of studying and living on predominately white campuses suffer from a ‘physical and mental wear-and-tear that contributes to a host of psychological and physical ailments.’” (“For Black College Prospects, Belonging and Safety Often Top Ivy Prestige” by Denene Millner, NPR, Code Switch, Opinion, February 26, 2017.)

♦ “[I]f you’re Black, even if you are middle class, there is something about the lived experience of being Black in America that weathers the body. And this is the theory of Dr. Arline Geronimus from the University of Michigan. And she believes that the high-effort coping of dealing with racism in America makes the body prematurely aged. And so if your body is older, then you’re more susceptible to every kind of health problem.” Linda Villarosa, from “How Systemic Racism Continues To Determine Black Health and Wealth In Chicago,” NPR, Fresh Air (with Terry Gross), May 6, 2021.)

the other thing is the ~ (journalist Linda Villarosa)

♦ "Geronimus coined a term for this chronic stress—she calls it 'weathering.'" (Artine Geronimus, University of Michigan.)

♦ "Clearly racism and experiencing racism, that also contributes to this kind of weather effect. You're in fight-or-flight mode. And so that has a real significant biological effect that contributes to premature aging." (Joseph Betancourt of the Massachusetts General Hospital. Heard on "Death Rate Among Black Americans Declines, Especially For Elderly People," NPR, All Things Considered (with Rob Stein), May 2, 2017.)

♦ "Author Linda Villarosa has been writing about the racial disparities in health outcomes for decades and recently covered the topic for the New York Times' 1619 Project. She says that while she used to think poverty was to blame for Black Americans' health problems, she's now convinced that bias in the health care system and the 'wearing' affect (sic) of living in a racist society are taking a serious toll on African Americans." ("1619 Project" journalist lays bare why Black Americans 'live sicker and die quicker,'" NPR, Fresh Air (with Dave Davies), June 14, 2022.)

♦ "The other thing is the idea of weathering. So weathering is the idea that fighting against discrimination day in, day out ages you prematurely. Each time an incident happens, it fires up the systems of your body, including your blood pressure, your cortisol, your stress hormones and even your pulse rate. So if that happens over and over and over, as it does in the case of people who are Black in this country, it weathers the body the way a storm might weather a home—knocks the shutters off, chips the paint. If we are weathered, which is a kind of premature aging, then it's not a shock why we would have worse COVID outcomes at younger ages." (The journalist Linda Villarosa, heard on "How COVID exposed racial disparities in all aspects of the healthcare system," NPR, All Things Considered (with Karen Grigsby Bates), June 20, 2022.)

 analysis

♦ "To be sure, many observers, beginning with de Tocqueville, have remarked that Americans are singularly concerned with their individual well-being. Since the 1830s, when de Tocqueville visited America, the United States has been swept by a series of popular movements concerned with improving health variously through diet, exercise, moral purity, positive thinking, and religious faith. Today, were a revived de Tocqueville to observe Americans jogging in parks, shopping in health food stores, talking psychobabble, and reading endless guides to keeping fit, eating right, and staying healthy, he would probably conclude that, if anything, the obsession is now more pronounced." (The Social Transformation of American Medicine by Paul Starr, winner of the 1984 Pulitzer Prize for general non-fiction.)

♦ “And here we get into questions of philosophy. My V-steam cost $50, which is a lot to pay for sitting over hot vapor. Is your money well spent on this stuff? It depends on what you’re looking for. It also depends on how much money you have and how you define wellness. Is a massage only supposed to feel good, or is it supposed to lead to a tangible state of bliss? Is it a pleasure of the now or an investment in tomorrow?” (“We Have Found a Cure! (Sort of...)” by Taffy Brodesser-Akner, Outside Magazine, 11/12/2022.)

Since the 1830s, when de Tocqueville visited America, the United States has been swept by a series of popular movements concerned with improving health variously through diet, exercise, moral purity, positive thinking, and religious faith. Today, were a revived de Tocqueville to observe Americans jogging in parks, shopping in health food stores, talking psychobabble, and reading endless guides to keeping fit, eating right, and staying healthy, he would probably conclude that, if anything, the obsession is now more pronounced." The men seemed in high spirits, even the survivors of the show: singing to the accompaniment of an accordion and a penny-whistle. The player who made the remark was Belgian, the on-field disruption resulted in 21 minutes of extra time being added on to the game, and the game ended in a 1-1 draw. Such is soccer nowadays.)

♦ "And it was in KSI's answer that he made the racist slur, using an offensive word sometimes used towards people from South Asian backgrounds. The reason “twat” was not spelled out seems to be that one of its meanings refers to a part of the female anatomy, like the C-word; the other meaning simply means something like “jerk” or “idiot.” And so media outlets seem to have not spelled out “twat” in an abundance of caution, and most audio clips bleeped out both words. Luckily, one audio clip bleeped out “fucking” but not “twat.” Of course, only Allysha Chapman knows what she meant when she said it. Talk about a tempest in a teapot! ♦ “[O]ne of the things that has always happened to a great many words is that they start out showing what we mean, but end up being used to show how we feel. ♦ “Cute” language reflects the user’s psychology and experience. It is often found in the language of food reviews, fashion and glamor magazines, Variety-type entertainment magazines like TMZ, etc. As for who typically uses this “cute” language, you figure it out.
