Abstract

With the development of technology, the circulation of information around the world has accelerated. Journalism has now entered social media and mobile phones and has started to accompany people everywhere. The role of the media in education helps to learn, develop and keep alive a culture, and then transfer it to new generations. Media messages prepared for educational purposes aim to educate the individual and society on certain issues.

The media is integrative with publications that raise awareness of the country, state and nation, make people popular, protect and protect national values. Thanks to the developing technology, politicians benefit from the educational role of the media by using new media tools as well as traditional media.

In this study, the concepts of communication and media are explained in detail. In the continuation of the study, it was tried to reveal what needs to be done about the realization of a successful corporate perception management by mentioning the importance of corporate perception management in public administration by making use of the developing technology.

Using content analysis, the interviews of the President of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus, Ersin Tatar, in the TRNC and universities in Turkey in October 2023 were examined.

Keywords: Press Office, Perception Management, Education, Content Analysis

Introduction

Thanks to the developing technology, it is easier to reach the masses today, and educational and instructive information is conveyed. Thanks to communication tools, perception management is carried out more quickly.

Thanks to perception, which is the process by which people make sense of the world, the individual makes sense of what is happening around him. Perceptions show what we see, what we believe, how we interpret anything, and how we behave. Perception is the design created in the mind by the information obtained by the sense organs. Perception management, which is used to guide people and bring them to the desired thought by applying it systematically, refers to the process of controlling the data reception that comes to our mind from the outside world through the sense organs. Perception management, which controls how people's information should be perceived by people, directs people's thoughts and tries to bring their thoughts to the desired point.

Corporate perception management, on the other hand, is the process of creating the most effective messages and conveying them to people through the most powerful channels so that they can effectively explain the activities carried out by institutions to the target audience. Corporate perception management, which is the communication method used by organizations to protect or improve their reputation and image, is a broad concept that covers the strategies created to direct people to a certain perception about the institution.

Perception management is an important phenomenon that shapes thoughts and behaviors and affects the individual from the society. Successful management of perception covers a wide range of areas, from the creation of a positive reputation and image from an institutional point of view to ensuring social unity and integrity. This situation makes it necessary for the public administration, which refers to the states and their service providers, to manage the perception institutionally.

This article addresses an important topic in the field of news reporting and perception management. Through the press office of the Presidency, news that is informative and expressive of individuals' opinions is examined.

Method

In this study, the educational role of TRNC President Ersin Tatar in the speeches made by TRNC President Ersin Tatar at universities in the Republic of Turkey and the TRNC on the Cyprus problem and national politics was examined by using content analysis and content analysis on the Official Website of the Presidency between 04-30 October 2023. In general, it focuses on the title of the news, the spot, the detail of the news, the news photo and the analysis of the message to be given.

Communication, Technology and New Media

According to Schultz (2001), communication is defined as the transfer of information between people and has an important role in all areas of social life. Individuals communicate for reasons such as sharing with other people, influencing and interacting with others (Demirci, 2002).

According to another definition, communication; it is the exchange of messages or thoughts through speech, sign (signal) or writing (Kaya, 2003).

The biggest factor of success or failure in communication is persuasion. The purpose of persuasion is to change attitudes or motivate them to take action" (Kaya, 2003).

Persuasive communication is mostly done through mass media and is aimed at reinforced, changing or eliminating people's attitudes. In persuasive communication, the source sending the message, the scope of the message and the characteristics of the recipient of the message are important. The persuasive communication technique is used to change attitudes and to behave contrary to attitudes. Since persuasive communication is related to the structure of the human psyche, it is one of the effective factors in changing attitudes. (South 2012).

Media, which derives from Latin in origin; It is derived from the plural of the word medium, which means environment, vehicle. Concept; It is defined as the whole of visual and auditory tools that have basic responsibilities such as informing, educating, etc., which take place through the transfer of all kinds of information to individuals or communities. The concept of media includes elements such as written media, visual media, and audio media. In this context, elements such as information, news, comments, etc. in the media can be conveyed to people in visual, auditory and written forms (Soydan, Alpaslan, 2014).

New media is considered as the creative combination of computer technology, telecommunications and content in order to create services and products that can be consumed by users using digital channels and to market them effectively (Gürbüz, 2010)

Ease of access and portability, personalization, fast and cheap media, storage and archive facilities reveal the general structure of new communication technologies (Çakır, 2009).

New communication environments offer possibilities that are quite different from the one-way communication features of traditional media. Users have ceased to be mere readers and have become people who contribute to existing content, comment, and express their opinions and suggestions (Zelan, 2014).

Unlike traditional media environments where individuals are message recipients or can make limited interventions in the communication process, the internet offers opportunities for individuals to participate in the communication process as active subjects (Çevikel, 2010).

The internet, which is an ever-evolving communication network, is a technology that has emerged after people's increasing desire to "store/share the information produced and access it easily". With the help of this technology, people can access information easily, cheaply, quickly and safely (Erbaşlar, 2013).

The Contribution of Technology and Communication to Education

Communication tools that have developed due to technological developments have provided speed and convenience to communication and at the same time turned communication into mass communication. Today, mass media such as newspapers, radio and television have become integral parts of communication (Özkök 1985). Developments in technology enable people to gain the opportunity to obtain information, especially in the electronic environment, and the gains we have achieved with our senses play an important role in our perceptions. In the struggle and debate over information, perception management is one of the important factors for success (Friman, 1999).

Developing communication technologies eliminate the limitations created by time, space and geographical distance factors; It has evolved in such a way that it is possible to integrate all information transfers in the form of sound, images, moving images and data into a single and flexible network. (Basaran, 2013)

Communication tools, which have rapidly gained new forms with the effect of technological developments, have developed in response to the need of individuals to receive news and learn. After this development, it has enabled the development of the communication network of individuals with each other, and with the development of the internet, being able to communicate with each other has become an important element in terms of communication, as well as receiving news and learning. The opportunities provided by the developing internet technologies to individuals have enabled the emergence of new media tools (Canan, 2013).

The main reason why the pre-internet mass media is called traditional media is that the flow of information in traditional media is one-way, that is, the feedback opportunities are very limited (Gürcan and Birsen, 2000). Individuals who are exposed to messages in these communication environments are mostly only message recipients or can only make limited interventions in the communication process (Çevikel, 2010). In this environment, where it is difficult for people to respond or react to the news, it is also very difficult for them to check the reliability of the information they obtain from these tools. In addition, it is easy for governments and various authorities to manipulate information or prevent access to information (Çildan et al., 2012)

The Role of Media in Public Opinion Formation and Education

Media messages prepared for educational purposes can be in different fields such as traffic education, health education, basic sciences. For these programs, which aim to educate the individual and society on certain issues, television, in particular, is very important because it is economical and easily accessible (Bilici, 2017; Kara, 2024). Education systems based on distance communication have become widespread, and people have the opportunity to continue their school life by following their lessons from these tools by using technology and communication and mass media (Alav, 2001)

It is emphasized that societies and cultures and nations and states can survive as long as the processes of learning, developing and keeping alive a culture and then transferring it to new generations continue (Arslan, 2004). The integrative function of the media in society; facilitating the achievement of the pluralism of messages necessary for all individuals, groups and nations to mutually recognize and understand each other, and to understand the conditions, views and aspirations of others (MacBride et al., 1993).

The media provides accurate news and information, motivates the society in a positive way, and prepares a democratic and positive discussion environment for the individual and society. The media also preserves cultural values, entertains and relaxes them and ensures their socialization. In addition to this, the media also has an integrative function as a result of the broadcasting approach that raises awareness of the country, state and nation, makes it popular, protects and protects national values (Alav, 2011).

The Concept of Perception, Perception Management and Its Importance

Perception is the process of organizing and interpreting the sensory data carried by our sense organs and giving meaning to the stimuli consisting of objects and events around human beings. Emotional data coming from different sense organs such as sight, hearing, smell and taste independently of each other turn into a meaningful whole through this perception process (Arkonaç 2005)

Perception, influenced by expectations, categorizes in the mind the knowledge that the person initially acquired, the actions and motives of other people. As additional information comes in, it updates this information and performs social perception activity (Arkonaç, 1998). While these activities are taking place, body language, words used, clothing style, and environment are important factors for perception. The combination of all these factors creates a value in the mind of the perceiver and enables him to comment (Baltaş, 2007).

Perception is an individual's sensory experiences of their environment and in the world. It involves recognizing environmental warnings and actions in response to those alerts. Through the process of perception, the individual learns about characteristics and environmental elements that are critical to survival. Of the factors that tend to influence the way people perceive, the most appropriate ones are those that are idiosyncratic, such as habits, motivation, learning, expertise, and social background (Otara, 2011).

Perception management, which has a long historical background, was systematically defined for the first time by the US Department of Defense. According to this definition, perception management is defined as "the dissemination and/or stopping of selected information by influencing the emotions, thoughts, goals, logic, intelligence systems and leaders of the masses; as a result, the target behaviors and thoughts are directed in line with the wishes of the target (Ersadi, 2011).

Perception management can be defined as the kneading of the meanings obtained about individuals with organizational processes and the use of the perception element in a way that contributes to the realization of the goals of the organization and the individual (Uğurlu, 2008).

According to Nye (2005), perception management is the skillful use of persuasion. Groups' attitudes, beliefs, and behaviors are influenced by perception management. For this reason, perception management is also a form of psychological operation.

According to Siegel (2005), Perception Management has three objectives. These are: To create public opinion both at home and abroad in order to gain and maintain legitimacy, to make adversaries believe what will happen to them as a result of their actions, and to influence the behavior and attitudes of the target audience in the desired direction

Perception management, which includes activities to influence opinions, aims to ensure that reactions develop in the desired direction. The main thing is to direct, to change attitudes and behaviors through perception (Tutar 2008).

Perception managers include individuals and states, non-governmental organizations, political parties, illegal organizations, media organizations, associations, agencies, companies, etc. Those named use Perception Management applications in line with their predictions and purposes and many tools are used (Özarslan, 2014). Corporate perception management includes steps such as "understanding how the policies, strategies, programs and models determined by organizations create a perception on individuals, controlling the perception created, shaping and directing the perceptions of the target audience in line with the determined goals, and maintaining the perception created" (Çalış, 2018, p. 34).

According to Simon Anhalt, a country's reputation and perception cannot progress in its own rhythm, and if a country cannot manage its own reputation and perception, it becomes governed by others (Sanberk & Altınay, 2008).

Since the public administration has to protect and improve its corporate reputation and image, it is important that the services it provides are accepted by the society. Managing reputation and image is of strategic importance for institutions. Managing reputation and image is possible by closely following the ability to analyze, strategic information and conjectural developments. It is absolutely necessary to benefit from perception management in the management of reputation and image in organizations. Communication strategies developed to direct people to a certain perception about the institution should be used effectively, negative perceptions about the institution should be eliminated and positive perceptions should be reinforced (Özkan, 2009, p. 76-83).
